KNIGHTLY SERVICE

Council's works honored by local official

MOCKSVILLE — The community service of the Knights of Columbus was recently honored by a special visitor.

Rep. Julia Craven Howard, R-N.C., was the keynote speaker during Council 12610's general meeting at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville Sept. 14.

Howard, a resident of Mocksville serving her eighth term in the N.C. House of Representatives, visited the Knights to pay tribute to their collective work and honor one of their members.

MISSION WORK

Lay missionaries from Mexico spread faith in N.C.

KINSTON, N.C. — For three lay missionaries from Mexico, the road to ministry leads past the Unity Free Will Baptist Church and used-car lots reminding them that Jesus saves and credit is no problem.

Not one of them expected to end up in North Carolina. They didn't expect to travel around the countryside preaching about Jesus in a car with no air-conditioning, nor to set up shop in the once-thriving town of Kinston.

Least of all did they expect to minister in the United States to Mexicans who have come north for work.

Margarita Espinoza Ferrer wanted to minister to Muslims in Africa.

ENGINEERING INNOVATIONS

Father Tom Alber poses with his vegetable oil-fueled car in Jefferson City, Mo., Sept. 10. After Father Alber accepted a new assignment requiring him to travel 200 miles on weekends and spend a lot on gas, the priest purchased a 1978 diesel car that he adapted to handle vegetable oil as fuel.

Forget cooking; priest uses vegetable oil as car fuel

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (CNS) — What's silver, goes 70 mph and smells like a Fry Daddy in Lent? In Jefferson City, it could be Father Tom Alber's car.

Covering for sick or vacationing priests in far-flung parishes meant spending hundreds of dollars a month on gas. The cost and his own curiosity led him to investigate affordable alternative fuels. Before long, he was looking into the renewable resource technology offered by the diesel engine.

When Rudolf Diesel began working on a new engine in the late 1890s, he envisioned it being powered by an array of fuels. Diesel ran his engine on 100 percent peanut oil at the World's Fair in Paris in 1900.

After Diesel's death in 1913, his engine was soon running exclusively on petroleum-based diesel. But the engine's design requires little more than a timing change to run on biodiesel, a fuel made from vegetable oil.

Father Alber's initial interest in biodiesel was cut short because, as he said, he "didn't think it would be such a great idea to run an experiment involving fuel and chemical agents in a room underneath our church."

But he soon found out that he didn't have to manufacture biodiesel to get a cheaper fuel. By the time he finished reading the book "From the Fryer to the Tank," he was convinced he could reconfigure a car to run on waste vegetable oil. He asked his brother, an engineer, to help him with the project.

The priest bought a 1978 car "with only 384,000 miles" and a diesel engine. For fuel, he got 250 gallons of vegetable oil after a parish fish fry.

After making adjustments to the engine, Father Alber learned that vegetable oil does not work well with starting the engine; so he put valves into his fuel lines so he can start the engine on diesel and then switch to the vegetable oil after a few minutes. He switches back to the diesel five minutes before shutting the car off to burn out any remaining oil.

Right now he wants to make his car's use of vegetable oil more efficient and practical. Recently, he went on a weekend jaunt that took him more than 600 miles.

With the additional tanks in the trunk, he still would have had enough fuel left to fry some chicken and hush puppies.

House passes bill barring federal court rulings in pledge cases

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The House of Representatives has approved a bill that would prevent the Supreme Court and all other federal courts from ruling on whether the words "under God" should be stricken from the Pledge of Allegiance.

Many opponents of the measure said they supported keeping the phrase in the pledge but felt that the bill was an unconstitutional attack on the federal judiciary and an effort to force a vote on a controversial issue during an election year.

The bill was passed 247-173, but there is little chance the Senate will vote on the measure this year.

The Supreme Court in June by an 8-0 vote upheld the use of "under God" in the pledge. It overruled, on a technicality, a lower federal court ruling that the phrase was unconstitutional. The lower court case involved a challenge by an atheist that his daughter should not be required in her public school to recite the pledge because of the reference to God.

The Knights of Columbus, a Catholic fraternal organization, was a leader in getting "under God" added to the pledge 50 years ago and has been at the forefront of legal efforts to keep the phrase from being erased.

The 1942 official version of the pledge did not contain the phrase. The Knights led a coalition of fraternal organizations that pushed for its insertion. The campaign was successful and the phrase was included by an act of Congress in 1954.

Pope reminds female prison guards to uphold human dignity

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Upholding human dignity must lie at the heart of all professions, but especially for prison guards, Pope John Paul II said.

"Every civil, professional and work training ethic must have at its foundation the primary value of the human person," the pope told some 400 representatives from Italy's prison guard system.

He made his address Sept. 27, the feast of St. Vincent de Paul, whom the pope said "personally suffered the harshness of prisons."

St. Vincent taught his followers to "pay special attention to that category of poor people known as convicts," said the pope. "He asked them to show understanding and to demand humane treatment" for prisoners.

Part of the group who met with the pope at his apostolic palace in Castel Gandolfo included female prison guards who had just completed a year of training. The pope had special words for them, urging them to take care of their spiritual lives.

"Your work calls for a solid human maturity that allows you to wed firmness with attention to the individual," he said.

"To this end, being women certainly helps you," since women possess qualities that benefit "interpersonal relationships," said the pope.

The inner strength that comes from prayer and from "a close union with God" will be necessary in the prison guards' work and everyday life, he added.

Vatican official says tolerance, respect key to fighting racism

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Teaching tolerance and respect is key in the fight against racism and discrimination, a top Vatican official told international delegates meeting in Brussels, Belgium.

Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald told the gathering that education "offers a unique opportunity to present — especially to the young — certain major values such as the unity of the human race, the equal dignity of all human beings, the solidarity which binds together all the members of the human family."

Archbishop Fitzgerald, head of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, represented the Holy See at the Sept. 13-14 International Conference on Tolerance and the Fight Against Racism, Xenophobia and Discrimination.

He told delegates that education plays a fundamental role "in the struggle against these evils."

The roots of racism and intolerance "are found in ignorance, prejudice, and hatred, which may often arise from a faulty and inadequate education and also from the misuse of the media," he said.

There is a constant need, therefore, "to monitor and to correct, if necessary, the presentations made in textbooks in schools," he added.

"Religious communities contribute to the culture of our societies and to the democratic debate within them," said the archbishop.

Although the spiritual dimension of a faith community is not often outwardly apparent, it is still "of demonstrable importance to the life of citizens" and warrants society's respect and understanding, he said.

Tolerance "does not imply renouncing one's principles or weakening one's adherence to them," he said.

Teaching tolerance in schools and through the media entails upholding "the freedom to adhere to one's own convictions while accepting that others may adhere to theirs as well," said Archbishop Fitzgerald.

Education in tolerance also involves respecting others' religious practices, "provided that they do not violate ... the rights of others, nor national security, public health or morals," he added.

Equestrian fair benefits ministry for homeless women

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

DALLAS, N.C. — On a bright warm day in early fall, 5,000-7,000 people gathered at Biggerstaff Park for the inaugural "Hoof'n' Holler," an equestrian fair and festival Sept. 24.

The daylong event benefited Catherine's House, a transitional residence for women and children who are homeless. The ministry, sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina, serves as a residential, transitional facility offering programs and guidance to women and women with children who find themselves temporarily homeless.

The Hoof 'n' Holler featured activities for adults and children including a parade of breeds, sheep shearing, hollering contest, clogging, pony rides and hayrides.

"I was overcome by the number of people from Gaston and Mecklenburg counties and beyond who came out to support this event," said Mercy Sister Bernadette McNamara, CEO of Catherine's House. "We received tremendous support from many churches in the Diocese of Charlotte."

Catherine's House assists women in their individual quests for employment, educational opportunities, emotional stability and ultimately, for self-sufficiency and affordable, safe housing.

At the end of the day, a 2004 Honda Civic was raffled off to winner Anita Self of Gastonia.

Sister McNamara said that although a final tally of money raised by the Hoof 'n' Holler was not yet known, it was a great success and they plan to host the event again next year.

"It showed how people are concerned about the homeless," said Sister McNamara.

CSS Triad office receives grant for pregnancy prevention program

WINSTON-SALEM — Piedmont Triad Regional Office of Catholic Social Services has been awarded a grant by the Winston-Salem Foundation.

The $37,500 grant will be used to provide matching funds for a pregnancy prevention program, according to Constance McVey, program director.

"During the past three years, our organization has been able to have a positive impact on the lives of many community youth through Sisters and The Code, our abstinence programs for young teens," said McVey. "The grant from the Winston-Salem Foundation will give us additional resources to expand and reach more young people ages 10 to 13."

Catholic Social Services began outreach programs in North Carolina in 1941 and has served youth in the Forsyth County area since 1980 through its Piedmont Triad Regional Office.

The Winston-Salem Foundation, founded in 1919, is a community foundation that supports charitable programs in the greater Forsyth County area.

Catholic youth to serve on representative's advisory council

BELMONT — Two young parishioners of Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont will have added responsibilities this school year.

Christopher Dean and Thomas Stocker are among the new students named to participate on the Youth Advisory Council to U.S. Rep. Sue Myrick, R-N.C., for the 2004-2005 school year.

The council is a group of high school students from different schools who have shown an interest in the functions of the legislative branch of government. Group members are selected based on a number of factors, including academic success, volunteer activities and extra-curricular participation.

The council meets on a regular basis to talk and share their opinions with Myrick about current events, politics and government.

GRANTING HELP

Foundation grants assist many in parishes, schools

$61,700 ISSUED TO DIOCESAN ENTITIES
THIS YEAR

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

GREENSBORO — The Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte is helping make a difference once again.

The Foundation has issued 20 grants totaling $61,700 to parishes, schools and agencies this year.

Jim Kelley, director of development and the Foundation, presented two of the grant checks in Greensboro during Masses at Our Lady of Grace Church Aug. 29.

During the morning Mass, Kelley presented a check of $5,000 to Roberta Hutchcraft, principal of Our Lady of Grace School. The grant allowed three teachers and a counselor to undergo training to better understand and work with learning-disabled students.

The group spent 35 hours attending "Schools Attuned," a development and service delivery program designed to help educators acquire the knowledge, skills and innovative tools to meet the diverse needs of kindergarten-through-12th-grade students.

Jim Kelly presents a $4,000 check from the diocesan Foundation to Rosa Delgado Martin and Carol Rodriguez Walton, members of the Greensboro Vicariate Hispanic ministry, during the Spanish-language Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church Aug. 29. Also present are Father Francis O'Rourke, pastor, and Father Luis Salvador Osorio, parochial vicar.

"It gives teachers a way to interpret how a child learns and use accommodations and interventions to assist them," said Libby Jones, counselor at Our Lady of Grace School.

The approach helps the students understand their uniqueness and how they can learn, said Jones, "so they don't let the obstacles overtake their lives."

For example, a problem with reading comprehension can spread to every aspect of a child's life, she said.

"That one obstacle can make a child feel like they are less than," said Jones.

The learning techniques can also be applied for the entire class, she said.

The program also consists of 10 hours of follow-up training and ongoing online learning support.

During the Spanish language Mass, Kelley presented a check of $4,000 to the Greensboro Vicariate Hispanic ministry.

The grant will help provide professional training and formation for the Hispanic lay leaders, said Enedino Aquino, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the vicariate, who is headquartered at the church.

"We'll be able to invite professional speakers and priests and provide workshops and training," said Aquino. "And we'll be able to send our lay leaders to institutes and training for their spiritual growth. It will make them better leaders — they'll bring back what they've learned and be able to better meet the spiritual needs of the community."

The grant will also help the ministry acquire better educational materials, said Aquino.

"It will help us continue our evangelization efforts," he said.

The Foundation, founded in 1994, is a non-profit organization established to provide endowments for the Diocese of Charlotte and its parishes, schools and agencies. By end of the 2003-2004 fiscal year, the Foundation had more than 118 endowments, nine of which were added during the past fiscal year. More than $1 million has been distributed in 11 years to parishes, schools and agencies.

"The Foundation's goal is that over time, every parish, school and agency will have an individual endowment set up," said Kelley.

Four years ago, the Foundation started a grant-making process open to all diocesan entities. In that time, 75 parishes, schools and agencies were awarded grants up to $5,000 each. The Foundation will continue to focus on programs that effectively support the poor; multicultural ministries; and evangelization of individuals, with a particular emphasis on those whose efforts are collaborative.

IN OUR SCHOOLS

In-service day keeps religion in the classroom

Teachers in diocese attend workshops

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — While diocesan school students enjoyed a day off early in the school term, their teachers and counselors were expanding their knowledge at in-service workshops at three locations in Charlotte Sept. 17.

In-service days, held throughout the year, are designed to motivate, inform and direct the spirituality of all teachers in Catholic schools.

"Although the rain and wind were coming from all directions, it did not deter the teachers and principals from fighting the elements to reach Charlotte," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools. "The religion in-service day brings us all back to the real reason for our existence as Catholic Schools."

Joe Holland, Ph.D., spoke to the high school teachers at Charlotte Catholic High School about "Catholic social teaching: The Holy Spirit's call to create a new global civilization based on a spirituality of life, ecological sustainability, human solidarity, institutions of peace and cultural diversity."

Holland is a professor of philosophy and religion at St. Thomas University in Miami, Fla. He is also the president of the United States Federation of Pax Romana/International Catholic Movement for Intellectual and Cultural Affairs.

Sister of Sts. Cyril and Methodius Pamela Smith, Ph.D., also spoke to teachers at Charlotte Catholic, presenting a prayerful reflection on the subject of "A Spirituality: Focusing on Action for Justice."

Sister Smith discussed her "daily life in light of living out Gospel values," said Sister Maureen Meehan, director of religious formation for diocesan schools.

Kenneth Doran addressed the kindergarten through fifth-grade and special-area teachers at St. Gabriel School. Doran spoke on the topic of creative teaching, the qualities and spirituality of the catechist and family catechesis.

Sister of Charity Carol Jean Willie, Ph.D., instructed the teachers on how to "unlock the giftedness in each child." Her workshop provided practical applications for creation instruction and assessment across all curriculum areas.

At the Four Points Sheraton in uptown Charlotte, school counselors and middle school teachers explored God's promise in Leviticus, "I will be your God and you will be my people," with Sister of Charity Joan Cook, Ph.D. Sister Cook is an associate professor of sacred scripture at Washington Theological Union.

"It is a yearly challenge to find speakers who are 'in sync' with the teaching of the Catholic Church and make them alive and meaningful to the teachers of the Diocese of Charlotte," said Sister Meehan.

"Every subject area taught can be connected to our Catholic social teachings," said Cherry. "Beginning or ending each of the three sections with prayer or Mass left all feeling that they are called and they are chosen to bring Christ alive to their students every day."

Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor for the Diocese of Charlotte, celebrated the closing liturgy at Charlotte Catholic, which included a choral performance by St. Ann School students.

"We know that everything we teach and everything we do is based on our Catholic faith," said Cherry. "The presenters brought that reality alive by showing all teachers, kindergarten

Reaching out to Iraq

Guardsman receives care packages, teddy bears for U.S. soldiers

BY SUSAN DEGUZMAN
CORRESPONDENT

WINSTON-SALEM — The outreach efforts at St. Leo the Great School have earned the attention of the N.C. National Guard.

With relatives of three students and two faculty members serving in Iraq, U.S. soldiers overseas were at the forefront of the school's outreach efforts last spring.

This year, a coordination of efforts from families, teachers and one second-grader in particular brought Col. Mabry E. Martin, of the 113th Artillery Brigade in Charlotte of the N.C. National Guard, to the school Sept. 24.

Col. Martin came to accept items collected by the school for delivery to U.S. soldiers in Iraq. He also spoke to the students about patriotism; offered insights on what it's like for soldiers to be separated from their families, particularly in a time of war; and emphasized the freedom enjoyed by U.S. citizens in their own country.

The colonel thanked the students for the prayers he had heard they were saying for soldiers and asked them to continue. Students pray for the soldiers and civilians serving and working in Iraq, as well as their families, on a regular basis, according to Maureen Patti, assistant principal, third-grade teacher and outreach coordinator.

For their efforts, Col. Martin presented a medal of appreciation to Georgette Schraeder, principal, who accepted it on behalf of the school.

Items collected by school families were then presented to Col. Martin. The school collection included canned fruit, nuts, hard candy, magazines and, most requested by soldiers, DVDs.

Another collection for Iraqi children included more than 100 teddy bears — the project of second grader Hannah Semke.

Hannah got the idea last summer when she heard a radio program dis-

"Out of the blue Hannah said, 'Let's collect those teddy bears and give them to children in Iraq.'" cussing Raleigh police officers collecting bears to donate to needy children. When she learned the Winston-Salem police had a similar program, Hanna was not discouraged.

"Out of the blue Hannah said, 'Let's collect those teddy bears and give them to children in Iraq,'" said Jean Ann Semke, her mother.

Determined to collect 100 bears throughout the summer, Hannah created elaborate signs and solicited donations from friends, neighbors and relatives. Hannah contacted area department stores and wrote letters to a number of notable people, including President George W. Bush, actress Hilary Duff, Duke University basketball coach Mike Krzyzewski, Wake Forest basketball coach Skip Prosser and Rep. Richard Burr, R-N.C.

Near the end of the summer, having exhausted her resources, Hannah's collection totaled 95 bears. The Semkes packaged them up and sent them off to Fort Bragg to be delivered to a unit of soldiers who have daily contact with the Iraqi people.

Colonel Mabry E. Martin of the N.C. National Guard receives a collection of teddy bears from Hanna Semke, a second-grader at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem, Sept. 24. Hannah came up with the idea to collect the bears for the children of Iraq.

But Hannah was not satisfied, according to her mother; she was still shy of her goal.

With the start of school, Hannah decided to ask the school families to donate teddy bears. With Schraeder's approval, Hannah's campaign blended with the school's outreach efforts for the soldiers.

Families donated 117 more bears that enabled Hannah to surpass her goal.

"It's really a tribute to the school that Hannah made the connection of 'sad, sick or poor children' to those in Iraq," said Jean Ann Semke. "The school did outreach at the end of the (school) year and prayed for the soldiers, and we talked about it more at home."

Col. Martin also received a third collection of items for Chaplain Dennis Goodwin with the 30th Infantry Brigade in Iraq who requested Christmas ornaments to decorate a seven-foot tree he plans to display for soldiers this December.

Loretta Allen, mother of a student whose uncle is serving in Iraq, brought the chaplain's request to Stephanie Iauco, school art teacher. Iauco worked with her students to make paper dove cutouts and paper wreaths for the soldiers.

Col. Martin spent some time answering questions from third- and seventh-grade students. Pat Mathews, math teacher, recalls a poignant question from one student: "When this war is over, will we have world peace?"

Mathews said Colonel Martin answered: "We pray for that."

parishioners attended the open meeting, as well as N.C. Sen. Virginia Foxx and Third Order Regular of St. Francis Father Andrew Draper, pastor and council chaplain.

"I'd like to recognize and acknowledge the past and present leadership of the St. Francis Knights of Columbus," said Howard. "Grand Knights Roger Hunckler, Jim Gildine, Vincent Mannino and David Taylor have worked tirelessly to lead this order in making a positive impact on our community."

"In the four years that you have been active in our community, you have made a real and lasting impact," she told the Knights. "And on behalf of the people of Mocksville and all of Davie County, we are grateful for your many efforts."

Howard highlighted some of the projects completed since the council was founded in January 2000, including raising $24,700 through its Operation LAMB (Least Among My Brothers) fundraiser.

"Already the Davie County Special Olympics, the Arc (of North Carolina) and South Davie Middle School have benefited," said Howard.

Other Knights projects highlighted included raising $3,000 for Davie County schools; donating $1,000 to South Davie Middle School for computer software needed by mentally handicapped students; giving more than $1,800 to the American Red Cross and sponsoring an annual blood drive; and providing an annual $500 scholarship for a Davie County ROTC student.

"You have provided for a number of needy families in Davie County with donations of furniture and other necessary items," said Howard. "... You raised $2,500 for the Storehouse for Jesus, in addition to the weekly donation of canned foods you provide to that organization, helping to provide for those in our community who need our help the most."

Because of these efforts and others, said Howard, "the St. Francis Knights of Columbus have won numerous awards from both the state and supreme councils."

"I can't imagine any council deserving this distinction more," she said. "It has been my pleasure to hear about and work with you over the years, and I look forward to seeing what new efforts await."

The council-sponsored Columbian Squires circle, for Catholic boys ages 12 to 18, has also three times received the Corps d'Elite, the highest service award for Squires, noted Jim Gildein, grand knight.

Gildein said the council was honored to have both Howard and Foxx at the meeting, but their community service isn't dependent on recognition.

"Someone reaches out to us and we react," he said. "We just want to help people who are in need."

Gildein said the council was one vehicle for parishioners to "go out and do the good works."

Howard also paid tribute to Mannino and presented him with a plaque from Gov. Michael Easley, in recognition for his "outstanding service to the great state of North Carolina."

"I personally know of the many lives that Vince Mannino has touched. He is a proven leader, a man with a heart of gold ..." said Howard. "Vince, I simply can't thank you enough for all that you are and all that you do."

"I was surprised. I didn't expect it," said Mannino. "My dedication is to the church, community and the people. I'm proud of the Knights of Columbus and the parish of St. Francis (of Assisi)."

Father Michael McGivney founded the Knights of Columbus in 1882 in New Haven, Conn., to aid widows and children in his parish. Today, the Knights provide more than $52 billion in insurance for members and their families.

With nearly 1.7 million members, it is the largest Catholic fraternal organization in the world.

According to recently released figures, the Knights of Columbus contributed a record $130 million to charity in 2003. The number of service hours contributed by Knights also was at an all-time high at 61 million hours in 2003.

The Knights awarded a record $1.5 million in college scholarships. They provided nearly $2.5 million in aid to 3,794 seminarians last year as part of their efforts to promote vocations to the priesthood and religious life.

FIGHTING FOR LIFE

Catholics rally for pro-life issues

RESPECT LIFE MATERIALS AVAILABLE TO DIOCESES, PARISHES

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Across the diocese and the United States, Catholics are gearing up for the fight for life.

The U.S. Catholic Church observes October as Respect Life Month, with Respect Life Sunday — this year themed "Made in His Image" — falling on Oct. 3.

Msgr. William P. Fay, general secretary of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the U.S. bishops inaugurated the Respect Life program with a resolution they adopted in the spring of 1972. The first of what the resolution called a "week of prayer and study dedicated to the sanctity of human life and the many threats to human life in our world" was held that October.

"Begun as a 'week of prayer and study' focusing on contemporary threats to human life, the program expanded to a month of prayer and study, and expanded quickly again to a year-round program that begins anew each year on the first Sunday of October," Msgr. Fay said.

"Obviously, we know that we're called to uphold the sanctity of life throughout the year, but it is good to focus on it more specifically in the month of October," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life ministry.

"It's a time to purposefully reflect on the gift of life, the dignity of life and the author of life," she said.

For many parishes, the Life Chain is a notable kickoff event for the month.

Held on Respect Life Sunday, the Life Chain is one of the more visible signs against abortion as people line city streets while holding placards with messages such as "Abortion kills children" and "Abortion hurts women."

This year, hundreds of Life Chains are expected to form across the United States. In the Diocese of Charlotte, parishes are participating along property lines of their respective churches, on city sidewalks and with other church groups in their towns.

The 32nd anniversary Respect Life Sunday kit materials are available in English and Spanish to dioceses and parishes from the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities. The Secretariat, under the guidance and direction of the Committee for Pro-Life Activities, works to teach respect for all human life from conception to natural death and to organize for its protection.

"The Respect Life program is the primary educational vehicle for the (bishops') Pastoral Plan for Pro-Life Activities," said Msgr. William P. Fay, general secretary of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The 2004-05 kit includes a poster in English and Spanish, fliers on the theme in English and Spanish, six educational essays on life issues, clip art for church bulletins or newsletters, a liturgy guide and a catalog of pro-life publications and resources.

The fliers, essays and liturgy guide are also available online at www.usccb.org/prolife, along with electronic versions of essays and other resources from past programs going back to 1996.

Essay topics are suicidal behavior by youth, advances in surgery for unborn patients, a critique of assisted reproductive technologies, effective strategies for pro-life advocacy, the human dignity of those in a "vegetative" state and a discussion of sex and marriage from sociological and theological perspectives.

The printed kit includes the essays in English only, but they are available online in both English and Spanish.

In addition to homily tips and sample intercessions for life for use at Mass, this year's liturgy guide includes a novena to Sts. Anne and Joachim and offers rosary meditations on the five "mysteries of light," based on events in Christ's public life, that Pope John Paul II introduced in 2002.

Sister Rupp, spiritual writer, receives U.S. Catholic Award

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CHICAGO — The Catholic Church has an overabundance of masculine energy that needs to be balanced with more feminine approaches, Servite Sister Joyce Rupp told nearly 200 attendees at a reception honoring her with the 2004 U.S. Catholic Award.

Since 1978, the award has been presented annually by the editors of U.S. Catholic magazine for furthering the cause of women in the church.

Sister Rupp, a spiritual writer and retreat leader, used the Chinese terms "yin" and "yang" to compare and contrast the approaches of men and women.

"A yang, or masculine, approach is organized, structural and concrete: 'Here is the information. I have found the facts,'" she said in her remarks Sept. 8.

"A yin, or feminine, approach looks at a theme or topic from many angles, reflects upon it from one's lived experience and then presents it to the group," she said. "It never acts like it has the final answer."

While noting that the church needs both the yin and yang approaches — information and lived experience — Sister Rupp said she sees an imbalance.

"There is such a predominance of yang energy in church leadership right now," she said. "Yin energy has almost been snuffed out, but I see women refusing to let this yin energy go the church's graveyard."

In her work as a spiritual director, retreat master, author and speaker, Sister Rupp said she encounters many women "in immense pain" because of how they feel they are treated by the church.

But she finds "nuggets of hope" in groups of women gathering around the world to find the sacred in their own experience, she said.

"If there are miracles happening in the church today, the central one is that women continue to remain within the church as faith-filled members," she said.

Sister Rupp is the author of many books, including "Praying Our Goodbyes," "Your Sorrow is My Sorrow," "The Cosmic Dance" and a recent book of poetry, "Rest Your Dreams on a Little Twig."

Previous winners include Sister Helen Prejean, a Sister of St. Joseph; Ursuline Sister Dianna Ortiz; the Catholic Theological Society; and the Benedictine Sisters of Erie, Pa.

In presenting the award to Sister Rupp, U.S. Catholic managing editor Heidi Schlumpf called her "a pioneer in feminine spirituality."

"Before it became a commonly accepted practice to find spirituality in everyday life, she was helping people find the divine in the ordinariness of family, work, relationships and nature," Schlumpf said.

She also praised Sister Rupp for being "a strong and consistent advocate for women to trust their own experience and for women's inclusion across the board. She is a gentle woman, but she is never afraid to speak the truth."

Forgiveness and healing go hand in hand

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Late in the afternoon a ritual occurs in high schools across the country, triggered by the final bell. Students scurry to meet buses, practices, parents or rides to work.

Closing the door, I enter the classroom and allow the bliss of sacred silence to envelop me. What was once a room filled with some 30 energy-driven students has become a time to finish the day's tasks in a vault of peace and quiet.

Generally, the time at the end of the school day provides an opportunity to begin to address the unending nightmare of papers to be graded and recorded. Moreover, it is the time to create new lessons that will generate even more papers.

On one such afternoon, lost in music and thought, I had that feeling of not being alone. I looked up from my work to see a handsome young man who looked as if he were dressed for the most important interview of his life.

"Mrs. Corzine?" he asked.

"Yes. May I help you?" I answered.

"I know you probably don't remember me, but I used to sit right over there," he said, pointing across the room toward a desk in the corner.

At the outset I did not remember, but as this young man began to talk I did, indeed, remember. Here, standing before me, was someone who had been one of the brightest, most rebellious, most drug-and-alcohol-ridden students I ever had encountered.

Ours had been a tortured relationship: I tried to help. Filled with anger and drugs, he wanted none of it.

Fortunately, his task this particular day was one I never will forget.

He told me: "I've driven past this school for months, wondering if you were still teaching here. I've been clean and sober for six years now. I finished college. I'm married and have a son. Today I decided it was time for me to stop and say thank you and to ask you to forgive me."

When I read the story about the healed leper who returns to thank Jesus in Luke's Gospel, I remember my student and know the power of Jesus is palpable in our world today. Forgiveness and healing truly go hand in hand.

Program for ABC-TV depicts faith-motivated service of U.S. Catholics

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — For the 65 million Catholics in the United States, there is no typical way to put belief into action.

In fact, there are many ways Catholics live out their faith as illustrated by "Faith Works: Across the U.S.A.," a new documentary slated to air on ABC-TV stations in October.

The show looks at ordinary days in the lives of several U.S. Catholics.

It profiles a priest in Alaska who pilots his own plane to remote parishes; a New Orleans restaurateur who teaches vital job skills to inner-city youths; and a woman religious who travels the back roads of Appalachia to provide health care to the poor.

The one-hour program, produced by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Catholic Communication Campaign, will be offered to ABC affiliates Oct. 3 to air at their discretion.

The Catholics who are featured in the program provide a sense of the depth and diversity of Catholic ministry, according to a USCCB news release.

The program highlights a Catholic elementary school principal in Fort Worth, Texas, who helps several immigrant families, and a Jesuit priest who is also a world-famous astronomer in Arizona. The principal and the astronomer share the same faith but express it differently.

"People know that the church includes hard-working, dedicated priests, women religious and laity," said Ellen McCloskey, CCC executive producer. "Still, we were delighted to witness firsthand the imagination and enthusiasm with which these faith workers share the Gospel."

Among those featured is Patrick Mulcahy and the "Wednesday Night Suppers" he created to provide a welcome dining experience for the needy at Most Holy Redeemer Parish in San Francisco.

"I hear the word of God and I look at myself and think, 'How can you put this into action?'" said one of the dinner volunteers, Ramona Michaels. "And because Patrick founded this wonderful place to feed the people, I think this is the best way I can put it into action."

"Faith Works: Across the U.S.A." was produced for the CCC by Digital Shooters of New York. The documentary is part of the "Vision & Values" series of the Interfaith Broadcasting Commission, a consortium of Christian and Jewish groups that provides religious and spiritual programming to network television.

The CCC is an effort of the USCCB to develop programming, public service announcements, and other resources to promote Gospel values in the media.

BBC announces withdrawal of controversial cartoon series 'Popetown'

LONDON (CNS) — A controversial cartoon program that lampooned the papacy has been canceled by the British Broadcasting Corp. following months of protests by British Catholics.

The BBC announced Sept. 23 that it would not broadcast the cartoon series "Popetown." The show was said to feature the pope as a childish retiree whose every fickle whim must be indulged.

In announcing the decision to cancel the show, Stuart Murphy, controller of BBC Three, said, "There is a fine judgment line in comedy between scurrilously funny and the offensive."

"I knew when we developed the series that there was risk involved, but unfortunately, once we saw the finished series, it became clear that the program fell on the wrong side of that line," he said.

Murphy said the comic impact of "Popetown" did "not outweigh the potential offense it will cause."

Cardinal Cormac Murphy-O'Connor of Westminster, president of the Bishops' Conference of England and Wales, said he was "very happy they have heeded my wishes and the concerns of Roman Catholics."

Bishop Crispian Hollis of Portsmouth, England, chairman of the bishops' strategic communications committee, said the program would have offended "the Catholic community who hold the person of the Holy Father in the highest regard and affection."

"Any attempt to belittle or diminish the pope's status as the leader of the Catholic Church is totally unacceptable, and not only to Catholics," he said.

Pope's World Day of Peace message

come by evil, but overcome evil by good," taken from a verse from St. Paul's Letter to the Romans.

In striving to achieve good and avoid evil, one cannot ignore "the many social and economic problems that burden people's lives," said a Vatican statement released with the theme.

The full text of the pope's annual peace message is traditionally published in December, just a few weeks before the church's Jan. 1 celebration of the World Day of Peace.

The theme aims to raise people's awareness of "evil as (the) cause and source of conflicts and wars" and of the "inseparable link between moral good and peace," said the Vatican statement.

The pope's message will aim to encourage all people to "practice personal and collective responsibility" for the pursuit of the common good and "to seek good as the surest and fastest road to peace," it said.

Andrea Torres Barragan left her job in agricultural sciences and asked God to send her to "the place where nobody wants to work," not thinking that place could possibly be the United States.

Coming to America never even occurred to Guadalupe Ramos Marin, who rounds out the trio recruited from a lay missionary school in Mexico.

"I never thought that God would call me to this country," she said. "But when God presented me this opportunity in my life, I said, 'Where you send me, I will go.'"

Four years ago, God's call sent them to Kinston. They work with three parishes: Holy Spirit in Kinston, St. Mary in Goldsboro and St. Catherine of Siena in Wake Forest.

Most weekdays they gather at Holy Spirit to plan the weekend liturgy, schedule faith formation classes, and offer spiritual and material help to those who seek it.

After their office hours, they go after those who do not seek their help — those who live and work out beyond the downtown area.

Other times the women go their separate ways, one to English class, one to guitar lessons so she can help with the choir, another to visit migrant camps.

Their job description — if such a thing exists in ministry — is to train and form lay leaders within the Hispanic community. They identify and develop eucharistic ministers, catechists, ushers, altar servers, lectors and anyone else a Catholic community needs.

But in the course of finding these potential leaders, they necessarily find a community in need. Their ministry is equal parts spiritual and physical, pious and pragmatic. It's a matter of keeping the immigrants in clothes as well as keeping them in the Catholic Church.

They must help with taxes and visas and schooling issues for children, find furniture and food. Luckily, said Barragan, other charitable organizations and Catholic Social Ministries of the Raleigh Diocese step in often to help.

Sometimes all that's needed is a heartfelt welcome and invitation to Mass. But the local Catholic church isn't the only one with that idea.

"One of the biggest challenges is that we have a large population of Hispanic people in this area who have not been catechized and who are going to other churches," said Barragan.

Another obstacle is that other churches have buses; the Catholic church in the area doesn't. It does little good to invite families to Mass if they have no way of getting there, although the lay missionaries put plenty of miles on their car driving parishioners to Mass or the store or school.

But even if the three lay women can provide transportation and faith formation and material assistance, many Hispanics have never received any of the sacraments.

So, the missionaries have developed a step-by-step program designed to bring all the families into full communion with the church.

On a recent afternoon that was the topic of conversation at a mobile home where men in blue uniforms gathered for lunch, while the women in the kitchen taste-tested pots of sauce and children watched English-language cartoons.

Three of the couples were making plans to be married. In Spanish they chuckled about the questionnaire the church requires of all engaged couples, wondering what would happen if they failed.

Visits like these are a cornerstone of the trio's ministry.

"It's a skill," explained Marin. "When we visit with them in their homes, they feel more comfortable with us, they have more trust in us."

day evening and Saturday.

"Everybody there thought it was great, everyone had a good time," said Joan Furst, OEO director. "People have been calling me telling me how good it was."

A "Taste of Havana" dinner in the parish hall kicked off the event, with proceeds going to Hispanic outreach programs in the local community.

Then the pavilion behind the church featured The Smoky Mountain Melodies band's country music, tales from professional storyteller Barbara Freeman and the presentation of OEO community service awards. Msgr. Mauricio W. West, chancellor and vicar general of the Diocese of Charlotte, presented the awards.

Eduardo Bernal, Smoky Mountain Vicariate Hispanic ministry coordinator, received the leadership award for his "creativity, boundless energy and great devotion in going above and beyond his designated job duties to develop leadership in the Latino community."

Joanne Kennedy Frazer, former director of the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace, received the distinguished service award for being "extremely instrumental in the establishment of the Office of Economic Opportunity."

Frazer also was "lead staff person ... in the writing and dissemination of the 1997 pastoral letter 'Of One Heart and One Mind' which raised awareness [about] those who were not participating fully in the economic growth of the state."

Saturday, Smoky Mountain Melodies and Freeman entertained again, along with the Rebels Without Applause band, the Brown Family singers and the Birdtown Crossing Drum Group with Native American hoop dancer Eric Bird.

St. William Men's Club cooked hot dogs and hamburgers and the St. William Ladies Guild sold baked goods. Community groups raised awareness with information displays, and vendors displayed pottery, woodworks, silver jewelry and handcrafted items.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

No discounts for fallen angels

Even the devil knows abortion is murder, evil

Editor's Note: This column, which originally appeared in the Jan. 16, 2004 issue of The Catholic News & Herald, is reprinted due to overwhelming popular demand.

As I was lounging in the diocesan hot tub the other day, I was paged about a visitor to see me. So I teleported down to the lobby of the Pastoral Center to see who it was.

To my horror and deep chagrin, I found the devil waiting for me. He was perusing the latest issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

"Someone actually lets you print this stuff, Kevy-boy?" he asked with a grin.

"What can I do for you, Lu?" I asked. You see, ol' Lucifer often stands out in the parking lot and makes faces at our windows to pester us. By this point, he and I were on a first-name basis.

"I would like to run an ad," he stated.

"An ad?" I was skeptical. "For what?"

"Let's talk in your office, and I'll tell you all about it."

So we teleported back upstairs. The devil's arrival on the third floor triggered the intruder alert system, and after I assured the diocesan SWAT team that Lu was my guest, we proceeded to my office.

He tossed a mockup of the ad on my desk.

"I can't let you run an ad for an abortion clinic!" I exclaimed, reviewing the ad.

"Why not?" he asked.

"Abortion is against church teaching," I reminded him. "It's murder."

"Baloney," he huffed. "It's simply the 'termination of pregnancy by the induced removal of an embryo or fetus (that is incapable of survival outside the body of the woman) which results in the death of the embryo/fetus.'"

"You don't actually expect me to believe that," I said.

"Of course not," he replied. "Heck, even I know abortion is murder. Why do you think I'm up here trying to place this ad? I've got to stoke the fires, so to speak. So, what kind of price are we looking at for the ad? Are there any discounts for fallen heavenly creatures?"

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

"Hold up," I said. "You admit that abortion is murder?"

"Do you think these horns make me stupid?" he asked. "If I recall correctly, it was I who came up with the word 'fetus.' Rather convenient, don't you think?"

"How so?" I asked.

"An unborn baby's heart begins to beat between 18 and 25 days after conception. Its brain begins to function as early as 40 days!" said the devil. "How can a human with a heart beat and brainwave activity not be considered a living being? So 'fetus' is a comfortable word to help people sleep at night."

"Some people say it's still a woman's choice because it's her body," I said.

"I've heard that one," laughed Lucifer. "But when did the government stop telling people what they can and can't do with their bodies? People want to put drugs in their bodies, but lawmakers say no. People want tattoos on their bodies, but that's illegal in some states. I could go on."

"But, have you ever noticed that it's only a 'fetus' when it's to be aborted?" he continued. "I mean, does anyone get invited to fetus showers? Does anyone ask a pregnant mother how the little fetus is doing? And, by golly, you'll never hear an expectant mother exclaim: 'I just felt the fetus kick!'"

He leaned back in the chair, plopped his hooves up on my desk and lit one of my cigars.

"What about abortions in cases of rape and incest?" I posed.

"Bah!" said the devil. "Even I know that pregnancy from rape is extremely rare. A study of one thousand rape victims who were treated after the rape reported no pregnancies. Besides, the circumstances under which the baby was created has no bearing on its value — it's still a human being. The only ones who really benefit from keeping abortion legal are the ones who profit from it. Speaking of which, can we get back to my ad now?"

"So, if you know abortion is the murder of unborn children, how can

Pope, at audience, says beauty includes thirst for holiness, justice

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Human beauty reflects divine beauty only when it is combined with a commitment to justice and the thirst for holiness, Pope John Paul II said.

"Beauty must be joined with goodness and holiness of life in order to make the glowing face of the good, wonderful and just God shine on the world," the pope said Sept. 29 at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

The pope, whose audience marked his return to the Vatican after three months at his summer villa, commented on Psalm 45, the "wedding hymn for the king," in his main talk.

The canticle, he said, "exalts the beauty and intensity of the gift of love between spouses," highlighting the beauty first of the groom and then of the bride.

In the church's evening prayer, the psalm is sung or recited in the way it is used in the New Testament's Letter to the Hebrews: as a hymn to Jesus Christ, the messianic king, the pope said.

The beauty of the bridegroom praised in the psalm is a "sign of interior splendor and divine blessing," he said.

"Fairer in beauty are you than the sons of men," the psalm says.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

Pope John Paul said the line has inspired Christians for centuries to depict Christ in art as a physically "perfect and fascinating man."

"In a world often marked by ugliness and baseness, this image is an invitation to rediscover the 'via pulchritudinis' ('path of beauty') in the faith, in theology and in social life in order to ascend to divine beauty," he said.

By emphasizing the authority, the love for justice and the hatred of evil that belong to the handsome king, the psalm emphasizes that physical beauty is of passing value unless it is accompanied by holiness and justice, the pope said.

Only when beauty "is united with spiritual goodness and with holiness does it become in men and women a manifestation of the goodness of God, of his splendor and his justice," said the Polish-language summary of the pope's talk.

you support it?" I asked.

He leaned forward. "What? Do I look like 'the Church Lady' to you?"

"No, but you're supposed to corrupt souls, not support the murder of unborn babies," I alleged.

"Four thousand abortions take place in the United States every day. Abortion has killed more people than the Civil War, Revolutionary War, both World Wars and the Korean and Vietnam Wars combined. As long as abortion continues in this country, souls are being corrupted, morals are fading and good people are failing," said Lucifer.

"Abortion is barbaric, it's true, but the more people stand up for it, the further they move away from that goody-two-shoes upstairs," he said. "People don't know that, and that works out well in the end for me."

I was troubled. Before I could respond, the Gold Phone rang. It's my direct line to the Vatican.

"Murray!" shouted the pope. "Get that devil out of there! He'll stain the rug!"

Unbeknownst to many, the pope actually monitors all of his dioceses on giant view screens set up in a massive control room. And never one to disobey the Holy Father, I quickly hung up, grabbed the devil by the neck and dragged him to the window.

"Sorry, Lu, I've got to get thee behind me," I said, and tossed him out the window.

He was none too happy, and began to raise Hell — literally — when the bishop's helicopter swooped in over the horizon.

"We'll continue this another day, Kevy-boy," said Lucifer, waving his fist at me. "Besides, I'm late for brunch with Osama bin Laden."

As he scurried off, I glanced down at his ad, still on my desk. Sadly, abortion is still legal in this country, and more than 1 million women get abortions per year. How, I wondered, could the most advanced nation on Earth still condone the senseless killing of the most precious, the most innocent, when even the devil knows it's wrong?

There is no discount for fallen angels. But will there be salvation for a society that doesn't change its sinful ways?

Soaking again in the diocesan hot tub, I thought of those who were joining in Life Chains this Respect Life Sunday, Oct. 3, for I knew God would be there with them, holding his anti-abortion placard, hoping to one day win the good fight.

Feeding body and soul

The next high should be God

I used to think my moods depended solely on the state of spiritual condition.

If I had paid attention to the priest's sermon at Mass and reflected on the words of the prayers instead of daydreaming about the 40 things I hadn't yet accomplished on my weekend's to-do list, if I had gotten down on my knees in the morning and consistently said my dawn meditation, if I had dutifully read the Bible before tucking in for the night, then I wouldn't suffer from anxiety and depression.

Now I think my mental state has more to do with what I ate for breakfast and lunch, on whether I have gotten this body into motion by running or swimming in the last month and on remembering to take my vitamins and antidepressants.

Of course, a stellar record of physical activity, nutritional balance and a boost from drugs isn't completely responsible for my soul's contents. I need God in my life. I try to foster my relationship with God as I would with a friend, sister or husband — by talking to him.

But interestingly enough, those moments with the Creator have the same physiological effect on my brain as exercise and proper diet.

In her groundbreaking book "Potatoes Not Prozac," Kathleen

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD

DesMaisons cites a few activities that trigger a beta-endorphin release in your brain, similar to the high an addict experiences from alcohol, drugs and sugar. She draws on scientific articles about the beta-endorphin effect of exercise, meditation, music, yoga, prayer, inspirational talks, sex and nutritious food.

That's good news for many young people like myself who used to live for the next high — be it from Marlboros and full-leaded lattes in the morning, six-packs of Miller Light and bags of Doritos at night or Godiva chocolates around the clock. These persons with sensitive biochemistries cope daily with dangerous yoyo emotions, spiking and then crashing so many times daily that they fall to their beds in exhaustion, only to wake weary in the morning, craving the first cup of coffee, which generates the cycle again.

I was only 18 when I discerned that alcohol wasn't my friend. Two pregnancies heralded the other changes, with a share of resentment. I wasn't a chain smoker, but cigarettes sufficed as a nice crutch in uncomfortable social situations when I couldn't drink. But the more I binge smoked and stopped, I realized I was once again on the dangerous road to addiction.

As I approached my daughter's due date, I counted down the days until I could once again wink at the barista at my favorite cafe, cueing him to make my regular coffee. But after her pediatrician detected an irregular heartbeat, I had to abstain another nine months (because caffeine is transmitted in breast milk), which was enough time to notice I was a much nicer person without that artificial boost of adrenaline in the morning.

The sugar epiphany has only come of late. As often happens, my 3-year-old son was my teacher. After unsuccessfully trying to tame his wild and unyielding tantrums following birthday parties at preschool, where he'd ingest cupcakes, suckers and fruit punch, I observed a pattern.

Following two episodes where his unbridled outbursts landed other children in the emergency room, I finally said "no mas." I studied up on how some sweets affect small brains and realized that my big brain wasn't benefiting from these socially accepted uppers either.

It's beginning to feel like Lent all year round for me. Which means I'm feeling a bit holier, or at least even keel, even when I miss my morning meditation.

Sixteen things I've learned about Catholics

Uncle Dan

DAN MORRIS
CNS COLUMNIST

Pulitzer-prize-winning humorist Dave Barry was recently credited with authoring a list of "Sixteen Things That It Took Me Over 50 Years to Learn," a litany that included entries such as "Never lick a steak knife."

It set me to pondering: Are there 16 things that took me more than 50 years to learn about the Catholic Church and Catholics? By golly, there are:

1. It is almost impossible not to laugh loudly when a 4-year-old drops the kneeler on his father's ankle, thus forcing the father to lurch forward and thwack his forehead on the back of the pew in front of him, which, in turn, can leave him (the father) a groaning lump.

2. Yelling at someone about your religious convictions actually decreases the chances that the person will hear you.

3. Attending Mass every week should not be confused with being holy. Probably it should, but it does not necessarily make us kinder or more moral than others.

4. Many times it is easier to pray to the Blessed Mother than to Jesus.

5. It is bad, bad form to decline a 5-year-old's invitation to hold hands during the Our Father.

6. Becoming enraged with God is a potential eighth proof of his existence.

7. There is way too much pressure put on pastors.

8. A good homily really can change a person's life. So can a bad one.

9. Patience is better than panic for communicating with God. But both work.

10. It is good to distinguish between prayer and wishful thinking, but sometimes nearly impossible.

11. No one knows why pew pencils are the same ones you use to keep score at a golf course.

12. The longer one stays away from confession, the harder it is to go.

13. Hanging around someone who is a veteran of the mission lands can be like Jesus rubbing spit on the blindness of one's soul, and they are always so darn happy.

14. Putting men and women religious on a pedestal is not healthy for them or us. We all need support, love and understanding in greater portion than adulation, pampering or deference.

15. Things Catholic make much better theater and movie material than any other religion.

16. The Hail Mary is like duct tape; kept handy, it can help you through a remarkable number of situations.

I know I left out all the truths about pancake breakfasts, bingo and the altar society. These are worth lists of their own.

Acceptance is key

Accepting God's will is the goal of a healthy spiritual life. Acceptance is what it means to be holy.

Holiness is not the reward of a lifetime of loving service. We give a lifetime of loving service because we are holy. Holiness is not what happens to us if we are kind and forgiving. We are kind and forgiving because we are holy. Acceptance is key.

Those who have attained any degree of holiness have done so because they have a basic disposition to do God's will. This also implies a willingness to accept what he allows to happen to us, even when we do not fully understand it at the time.

Lots of bad things happen to good people. There is an abundance of misery and injustice in the world. Acceptance doesn't mean that we should become absolutely passive. It is normal to complain when we are getting pushed around.

If one is disposed to do God's will, however, then one learns to accept the kingdom of God despite the negativity all around us. ("Thy will be done," "Thy kingdom come.") The soul is in the right disposition for further growth when it reacts with faith, not emotions.

There will be doubt and confusion all the way along. Even the saints lived in emotional turmoil as they tried to lift up their spirits and stay the course. This constant effort to do God's will, accepting what is unavoidable, is a sure sign of holiness. We are gaining heaven one day at a time.

Father Thomas Merton, the Trappist monk who wrote "Seven Storey Mountain," was no stranger to controversy and suffering. He wrote a helpful book on solitude in which he revealed his interior struggle. Here is a lovely prayer from that book:

"My Lord God, I have no idea where I am going. I do not see the road ahead of me. I cannot know for certain where it will end. Nor do I really know myself. The fact that I think I am following your will does not mean that I am actually doing so. But I believe the desire to please you actually does in fact please you. And I hope that I have that desire in all that I am doing. I hope that I will never do anything apart from that desire. And I know that if I do that, you will lead me by the right road. Though I may seem lost and in the shadow of death, I will not fear, for you are ever with me, and you will never leave me to face my perils alone."

This humble prayer expresses what most of us feel so often in our spiritual lives. We are always trying to rise above the confusion and doubt. Rising to the level of cheerful acquiescence takes time, but with God's grace it is possible.

We know with certainty that he loves us with an infinite love and wants to give us a share in his happiness. Trust him. Think much more about his love and much less about your unworthiness.

And if in the process of fighting against injustice or correcting abuses you get burned by the opposition, don't be discouraged. As the song goes, "Just pick yourself up, brush yourself off and start all over again."

In this way you can die in the peaceful knowledge that even though you were confused, you tried to do your best.

Conventual Franciscan Father William Robinson, pastor of Our Lady of Mercy Church in Winston-Salem, digs the first shovel of dirt at the groundbreaking ceremony for a new church building Sept. 12, 2004. Approximately 400-500 people attended the groundbreaking.

WINSTON-SALEM — Our Lady of Mercy Church was founded in part because of a large influx of Western Electric employees who relocated from New Jersey to Winston-Salem in 1954. To meet the needs of the families, two houses on South Main Street and land were purchased and plans for the church were begun.

At that time, Catholicism was not readily welcomed and several restrictive zoning ordinances had to be overcome before the church could be built. Finally the problems were surmounted and one house was renovated to become the rectory, and later became the parish center.

For some time Mass was celebrated in the rectory as the little parish began to make its presence known in Winston-

Salem. At the time of its establishment, there were just a few parishioners, but by the end of the first year 235 people were members of Our Lady of Mercy Church and the church had its own mission, Our Lady of Fatima Chapel.

Plans for a new church building began with a fund drive to pay for a combined church and school building. Mass was celebrated for the first time in the new church on Mother's Day, 1957. In the fall, the school complex adjoining the church was dedicated by then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters. Sisters of St. Joseph from Chestnut Hill, Pa., came to staff the school and served as administrators and teachers for the next 30 years.

As the years passed, the number of parishioners at Our Lady of Mercy Church did not grow as expected for several reasons. First, Our Lady of Fatima Chapel was established as an independent parish and many Our Lady of Mercy parishioners were moved there. Also, the number of Catholics in Winston-Salem was not increasing rapidly.

In 1967, the citywide problem of parish numbers was somewhat alleviated when parish boundaries were changed. A continued increase in growth began at that time and continues today, allowing the people of Our Lady of Mercy Church to provide many outreach programs.

The church has been staffed by Conventual Franciscans since 1987. Franciscan Father Conall McHugh replaced Franciscan Father Canice Connors in 1991. Franciscan Father William Robinson, the present pastor, has served Our Lady of Mercy Church since 2002.

Like so many parishes in western North Carolina, Our Lady of Mercy Church has experienced tremendous growth in its Spanish-speaking population. To serve the Hispanic population, a weekly Spanish Mass was added in 1995.

Within the last 15 years, the parish's Hispanic population went from 37 people to more than 500. Hispanics now make up nearly 50 percent of the parish.

Faith formation and sacramental preparation programs are offered in Spanish as well as English. A parishioner has volunteered to serve as a liaison between the Hispanic and Anglo communities.

Hispanic parishioners also serve on the pastoral council and a variety of parish commissions.

More than 400 people attended the groundbreaking for a new church building Sept. 12. Father Robinson said he expects the new church to be ready for its dedication by September 2005.

The new bi-level facility will feature an upper-level church with seating for more than 850 worshippers and a fellowship hall and offices on the lower level.

The parish continues to focus on peacemaking, reconciliation and relationship building.

The mission statement of the church reflects the community's desire to serve others: "While rejoicing in all signs of integral communal life, Our Lady of Mercy community holds itself accountable for seeking out and welcoming the stranger and the alienated; for identifying with the powerless and those on the margins of society and for empathizing with the suffering and aggrieved."

KERNERSVILLE — The Diocese of Charlotte has begun using an innovative, online ministry formation program for its youth ministers.

The Ministry Training Source program consists of 12 online courses of three modules each and is geared toward addressing the national competency based standards of youth ministers as specified by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The majority of the course work, spread over a two-year time span, is done online, but students are required to attend one face-to-face class. The first such class was held at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville Oct. 2.

WASHINGTON — The pro-life spokeswoman for the U.S. Catholic bishops praised the Justice Department's Sept. 28 announcement that it would appeal federal court decisions in New York and Nebraska that ruled the federal ban on partial-birth abortions is unconstitutional.

"We commend the U.S. Department of Justice for its vigorous defense of the ban on partial-birth abortion," said Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information in the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities.

MARCHING FOR MARRIAGE

Marchers carry a pro-marriage and family banner as they walk through the streets of San Francisco April 3. The rally was held in response to the city issuing more than 4,000 marriage licenses to same-sex couples from February to March, when the California Supreme Court ordered a halt to the practice.

House vote on amendment to ban same-sex marriage fails

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. House of Representatives rejected a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages Sept. 30.

The Marriage Protection Amendment, backed by the nation's Catholic bishops, received 227 votes in favor to 186 against. To reach the two-thirds majority required for passage, it would have needed at least 290 votes.

In a letter to House members Sept. 28, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said marriage as the union of a man and a woman is not just a Catholic concern but "part of the common moral heritage of humanity."

"It is precisely this moral heritage that must be protected today from a small but vocal minority that would alter the definition of marriage by making same-sex unions the legal equivalent of marriage," Bishop Gregory wrote.

"A same-sex union is not equivalent to marriage," he added. "It is not based on the natural complementarity of male and female; it cannot cooperate with God to create new life; it cannot be a true conjugal union."

He said marriage "is more than a lifestyle choice. It is an interpersonal relationship with public significance."

The nation's bishops, he said "strongly believe that marriage is a basic human institution and that, though it is regulated by civil laws and church laws, it did not originate from either the church or the state, but from God. Accordingly, the bishops believe that neither church nor the state can alter the basic meaning and structure of marriage."

In referendums this summer, voters in Missouri and Louisiana overwhelmingly approved state constitutional amendments upholding the traditional definition of marriage, and voters in eight more states will be voting on similar amendments Nov. 2.

The proposed federal constitutional amendment said, "Marriage in the United States shall consist solely of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any state, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than a man and a woman."

The amendment was killed in the Senate in July by a procedural vote tabling it.

In September 2003, the 47-bishop Administrative Committee of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops issued a statement calling for a federal constitutional amendment to protect marriage as the union of a man and a woman. At their November meeting, the full body of bishops overwhelmingly approved a 2,000 word teaching statement on the nature of marriage in society and in church teaching.

In the national elections Nov. 2, state constitutional amendments to protect the traditional definition of marriage are on the ballot in Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Montana, Oklahoma, Oregon and Utah.

Supreme Court declines Catholic Charities contraceptives case

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Supreme Court Oct. 4 declined to hear the appeal by Catholic Charities of Sacramento, Calif., of a ruling that would require some religious organizations to pay for employees' contraceptive insurance benefits.

The court rejected an appeal of the March ruling by the California Supreme Court that said Catholic Charities may not be exempted from a 1999 law requiring employers who provide insurance for prescriptions to include contraceptives.

Catholic Charities had challenged the law on the grounds that the church-sponsored organization should not be required to pay for something the church considers to be sinful.

The decision could affect universities, hospitals and social service agencies run by churches of all faiths. An appeal of at least one other state's similar law is still pending in the courts.

California's Women's Contraceptive Equality Act has an exemption for "religious employers" but defines those as nonprofit institutions directly involved in inculcating religious beliefs, and whose employees and beneficiaries of services are primarily members of the faith group.

The state court ruling said Catholic Charities does not qualify because it offers secular services to the public without regard for the recipients' beliefs and without preaching about Catholic values. Catholics do not make up either a majority of its employees or a majority of the recipients of its services.

In his appeal to the federal court, Catholic Charities' attorney Kevin Baine said, "If the state of California can coerce Catholic agencies to pay for contraceptives, it can force them to pay for abortions."

Benedictine nuns set to take over for Carmelites in Vatican cloister

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The “Mater Ecclesiae” cloister in the Vatican gardens combines a traditionally strict life of prayer and manual labor with the innovative practice of bringing in new residents every five years.

Pope John Paul II established the cloister in 1994 to ensure the presence of a perpetually praying community of women within the Vatican walls and to highlight the richness and variety of contemplative orders of women religious present in the Catholic Church.

His assistant secretary of state, Archbishop Leonardo Sandri, celebrated Mass in the cloister Oct. 1. During the Mass, the archbishop thanked the Discalced Carmelite nuns who have lived, prayed and tended a garden in the small monastery since 1999.

With the end of the Carmelite’s five-year service, a group of contemplative Benedictine nuns is preparing to take up residence in the monastery.

The monastery’s bylaws specify the aim of the community is “the ministry of prayer, adoration, praise and reparation” in silence and solitude “to support the Holy Father in his daily care for the whole church.”

During the Oct. 1 Mass, Archbishop Sandri thanked the Carmelites for their witness of “a profound and shared joy, which is a sign of an intense spiritual life, of a great love for the Holy Father and the church and of great agreement among yourselves in your daily tasks.”

Pope honors journalists for risking their lives in areas of conflict

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II paid tribute to journalists who, sometimes risking their lives, illustrate the need for peace and freedom in regions torn by conflict.

During an Oct. 2 audience with employees of KTO, a French Catholic television station, and with representatives of a French journal, Politique Internationale, the pope also condemned political hostage-taking.

The pope’s remarks were read as a reference to the ongoing wave of hostage-taking in Iraq as fears continued over the fate of two French journalists kidnapped in mid-August.

During the audience, the pope received the “Political Courage Prize” sponsored by the Catholic television station and the international policy journal.

The pope said the prize highlighted “the church’s mission of peace in a world where conflicts are, unfortunately, too numerous.”

“I want to launch a new appeal for peace, for the building of a society of brotherhood among peoples,” he said.

“My thoughts go to journalists, who, through their witness and their publications, are artisans of peace and of liberty and who pay a heavy price in conflicts,” he said. “I am thinking, as well, about the hostages and their families, innocent victims of violence and hatred.”

The pope said human beings must never be used as bargaining chips for political or military power.

In Mexico City, Dalai Lama leads prayers for world peace

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — The Dalai Lama joined Mexico City Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera and other Mexican religious leaders in prayers for world peace while calling for mutual understanding among the world’s religions.

In an interreligious ceremony held in Mexico City’s Metropolitan Cathedral, the Dalai Lama urged people not to blame religion for the world’s conflicts, saying wars often have more worldly motives “such as money, power and politics.”

“There are some that think there is a clash between the Western civilization and Islam. I think they are wrong,” the Dalai Lama said Oct. 4, the second day of his four-day visit to Mexico.

Cardinal Rivera praised the Dalai Lama for campaigning for peace and human rights around the world.

“You, Dalai Lama, have done honor to your title, which means ‘ocean of wisdom,’” Cardinal Rivera said.

The Dalai Lama, smiling the entire time, said he would remember the ceremony and Mexico City’s cathedral as long as he lived.

The ceremony included religious leaders from Mexico’s Islamic, Buddhist, Hindu and Greek Orthodox communities, as well as from several Protestant faiths.

The Dalai Lama and about 100,000 Tibetan Buddhists fled into exile in India in 1959 when China, responding to an uprising against its rule, crushed a rebellion and placed tight controls on Buddhist monasteries. China’s occupation of Tibet began in 1950.

The Dalai Lama received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989.

SAINTLY SERVICE

Secular Franciscans honor St. Francis with Transitus service

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — The teen-age Francis of Assisi was a romantic troubadour and center of attraction among his peers. Like many wealthy young men during the 1200s, Francis donned armor and rode off to war in neighboring towns.

But Francis was captured and imprisoned. During this time, the grandeur of knighthood turned into the stark reality of bare existence and Francis developed a compassion for the poor, said Ruth Thoni, minister of the Fraternity of Brother Francis, the Hickory-based Secular Franciscans Order.

Thoni spoke at the group's annual Transitus service at St. Aloysius Church in Hickory Oct. 3. This month annually, members of Franciscan religious and secular orders around the globe gather to commemorate the passage of St. Francis from earthly life to everlasting life.

The feast of St. Francis, patron saint of animals and the environment, is Oct. 4.

After dedicating himself to poverty and humility, Francis' good works, devotion to the Eucharist and preaching drew many followers. He founded the Friars Minor, or Franciscans, which now has more than 28,000 priests and brothers serving around the world.

During the service, the Hickory Secular Franciscans presented several stories from the life of St. Francis, who was born at Assisi in Umbria around 1181; one story was about the miracle of the stigmata (wounds of the crucifixion) received by Francis in September 1224.

After God appeared to Francis and told him something wonderful was to happen to him, Francis consulted the Gospels, asking a friend to open them three times at random. Each time, the book opened to the story of the Passion of Christ.

From this, Francis understood that, having imitated Christ in life, he was also to imitate him in the sufferings that preceded his death in 1226.

Francis was praying one morning when a seraphim appeared to him. Afterward, Francis' hands and feet appeared to have black nails driven through them, and he had a wound on his side that looked as though it had been made with a lance. The wounds never healed or disappeared and were still there when he died two years later.

Franciscans seek to imitate the life of Christ in the way that St. Francis did, by consulting the Gospels for guidance, said Thoni.

Secular Franciscans promise to devote themselves especially to careful reading of the Gospels — going from Gospel to life and life to Gospel — as St. Francis is known for taking the Gospels literally. Franciscan values include creating a caring community, showing compassion for others, respecting and caring for God's creation, and making peace through healing, reconciliation and forgiveness.

"When we come together, we counsel one another as a group," said Thoni. "People who are attracted to Francis embrace this way of looking at God."

About 30 people attended the service, which followed with a movie about the lives of St. Francis and St. Clare of Assisi.

Diocese among highest in ordinations in country

"The Charlotte Diocese seems to be attracting (a number of) men to the priesthood that is out of proportion to its population," said Dr. Mary Gautier, CARA senior research associate.

CARA was created in 1964 by the bishops and religious superiors of the United States as an independent agency to assist church leaders in planning, using the tools of social science research.

A majority of the dioceses reporting gains in ordinations have more than 1 million Catholics. Most have seminaries within their borders.

According to CARA, the Diocese of Charlotte has the smallest number of Catholics among the top 11 dioceses with high ordinations, with a population of 138,000 registered Catholics and an estimated 125,000 unregistered Hispanics. Priests are trained outside the diocese because there are no seminaries within the western 46 counties of North Carolina.

CARA statistics show that 20 men have been ordained to the priesthood in the diocese between 2000 and

Father John Allen, diocesan vocations director, chats with Pat Hoare, a former insurance company vice president and seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte, at the Cardinal Newman Residence for Priestly Formation in Charlotte in 2002.

2003. The report lists a ratio of 6,929 Catholics per newly ordained priest (or ordinand) for the Diocese of Charlotte. By comparison, the number one diocese in attracting men is the Archdiocese of Chicago, which has ordained 46 priests in the same time frame as the Diocese of Charlotte.

The Archdiocese of Chicago has more than 2.4 million Catholics and the ratio of approximately 53,000 Catholics per ordinand is far higher than that of the Diocese of Charlotte.

According to Gautier, there is no single factor that makes a diocese successful when it comes to attracting men to serve as priests.

"It begs the question, 'What are these places doing right?' and is worth more study," she said.

Father John Allen, director of vocations for the Diocese of Charlotte, attributes the success in the diocese to several factors.

"We require all priests to live in the diocese for a year before they can begin seminary education, and they must be recommended by a priest of the diocese," he said. "Our priests are the best source of referrals for us."

The typical seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte has completed at least two years of college and has achieved academic success, said Father Allen. All candidates for the seminary also go through extensive background checks and undergo psychological testing.

But personal contact is the key to success, said Father Allen.

"Our priests and the bishop have regular contact with the men who are in the seminary and the communication continues once they are ordained," he said.

Father Allen expressed pride in the number of men who are coming to the diocese to answer their vocations. He noted that all of the men who were ordained during the last five years are still in active service.

That statistic is unusual for a diocese, according to Dr. Dean Hoge, a sociologist at the Catholic University of America in Washington, who has written a book about turnover among priests during the first five years.

"Priests resign during the first five years because they are lonely and unappreciated or because they decide that the celibate lifestyle will not work for them," said Hoge.

"The critical factor for success appears to be communication," he said. "Men who feel they can talk with their bishop or vicar general are usually happier in their vocation."

Hoge also pointed out that serving in a smaller diocese is advantageous to the happiness of priests.

"In some large dioceses, the bishop or cardinal doesn't even know the name of all the priests," he said.

The Diocese of Charlotte has 135 diocesan and religious order priests serving the needs of the faithful. A large diocese, such as the Diocese of Chicago, has as many as 800 priests.

Poetry residency inspires Catholic students

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Students at Asheville Catholic School recently took a new look at themselves through poetry.

Asheville poet Dan Dutterer participated in a weeklong poetry residency with performances for students Sept. 20-24.

A familiar performer with local groups, most recently with the Montford Park Players in a Shakespearean production, Dutterer said he wanted to impress the way he sees things upon the students, hoping they would see things in new ways.

"The more we search and the more we journey into ourselves to find what things mean to us, the more we unravel," he said.

Poetry is fun "if you let your mind go," he said. "It's a seed. You plant the seed, nurture it, take care of it and it will grow into something with strong roots."

In working with the students, Dutterer found the "younger the child, the more fertile the mind is, the less inhibited."

The older children have to work a little harder to become spontaneous and not worry about what their classmates might think of their poetry, he said.

Once the students relaxed, Dutterer explained how they can start with their own images and then take them a step further.

"Poetry paints a picture," he said. "Each word is like a brushstroke in that painting."

In the seventh-grade workshop, Dutterer said the students learned that inspiration "comes from a lot of places."

Several students wrote and recited original poems and discussed what had inspired them.

Ian Wilson said his poem, "Something," was inspired by two of his classmates after he struggled to find something about which to write. The class chose it to perform before the student body during the Friday assembly, which featured a poem read by each grade participating in the poetry residency.

Dutterer, who has a bachelor's degree in theatre arts from Catawba College in Salisbury, believes children can absorb and understand literature, poetry and art if the subjects are explored on their levels.

He hoped the students would take away the joy of poetry, and "a plethora of things they can do with it."

Poetry, he said, is something that will "make a dent or a scratch in your mind, and it will stay there forever."

Stamping out hunger, one step at a time

St. Pius X School has 100 percent participation in Crop Walk

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — St. Pius X School in Greensboro again took to the streets to help fight hunger.

Students, faculty and parent volunteers participated in their fourth annual Crop Walk Oct. 1. Each class walked for a half hour during the course of the day to help raise funds for the hungry in Greensboro and throughout the world.

Before blessing the participants at the start of the walk, Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church, evoked the words of Mother Teresa: "Small things done with love can help change the world."

Pat Arnett, director of development for Crop Walk, was present for the opening ceremonies and expressed her gratitude for the efforts of the students and faculty.

This is but one of many Crop Walks arranged by religious communities, schools, businesses and civic organizations throughout the area. While 75 percent of the funds raised will go to Church World Service, an international relief agency that provides emergency aid and supports sustainable self-help development in 80 poverty-stricken countries, the remaining funds will go toward the Greensboro Urban Ministry's Potter's House Community Kitchen to help feed more than 350 people daily.

A percentage of donations this year will also be used to help the people in the Caribbean and the southern United States recover from the recent onslaught of devastating hurricanes.

"We collected a total of $23,000 during the three previous years," said Anne Knapki, assistant principal. "During those last three years, funding for food was made available to the heroes of 9/11, as well as the peoples of Iraq and Afghanistan."

Expectations were high this year as 100 percent of the students participated in the Crop Walk, she said.

The school's fundraising efforts began shortly after Labor Day, when letters were sent home to parents about the student body's goal of raising $10,000, according to Vicki Spriegle, who organizes the school and parish Crop Walks.

"It is really getting easier as each year passes, especially with the fantastic amount of parental involvement and the eighth-grade volunteers," said Spriegle.

Each student also purchased a Crop Walk T-shirt financed by local businesses, the profits of which were contributed to the Crop Walk.

"It is important because we raise money for people who are in need," said eighth-grader Meg Weckworth, who has participated in the school Crop Walk for the last three years.

"We also like helping people."

"It's great that the kids realize what they have and what other people don't have, and that they're willing to help," said Kristin Schiott, athletic director and physical education teacher.

All proceeds collected by St. Pius X School will be added to the overall contributions of the parish Crop Walk, which will take place at the Greensboro Coliseum Oct. 10, one of five area walks scheduled that day. Participants are encouraged to bring canned food items to their walk for Greensboro's Urban Ministry's Food Bank.

Leigh Sterten (right) instructs the inaugural class in a new online ministry formation program for diocesan youth ministers.

Youth ministers begin training online youth ministers and teachers from parishes throughout the diocese spent eight hours with instructor Leigh Sterten, program creator and co-founder of Ministry Training Source, a nonprofit organization that trains, forms and educates individuals and organizations to be more effective ministers in the church.

"This program is but one of many ways used in the training of youth ministers, but handbook formation and independent studies are not as complete as the Ministry Training Source," said Peg Ruble, assistant director of diocesan youth ministry. "It is unique in that it is both structured and independent at the same time."

The cost of the program ranges $2,500-$3000, depending whether or not the students need computers. The cost is usually carried by the students but can be paid, completely or in part, by the students' parishes.

Although the course work is done online, students are encouraged to work together in their studies for the purpose of review, focus and information retention. The end result is a certificate or a bachelor's or master's degree, depending on the education level previously achieved by the student.

"I have been working on this program for a little more than a year and it is awesome," said Terry Aiken, youth ministry director at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point.

"This program is long overdue for the National Certification for Youth Ministers," said Aiken. "It has validated and affirmed that we are on the right track, especially through its relationship building and creativity."

"I have learned quite a bit about my own learning styles and have been enabled to take the kids to another level," he added. "When we can learn something like this from a youth ministry program and can teach the kids how to be leaders, we know that it's working for us in a very positive way."

Chad Thieman, youth minister at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir, said the program has already taught him how to better budget his time and be a better spiritual leader.

"I have become knowledgeable with issues of the Catechism of the Catholic Church and youth ministry," he said. "I believe more people should take advantage of the program."

FIGHTING FOR LIFE

Partial-birth abortion rulings praised

society for this cruel and inhumane practice," she said in a Sept. 30 statement.

In a Sept. 8 ruling, U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf in Nebraska became the third federal judge this year to declare the partial-birth abortion ban unconstitutional. He said the 2003 law should have included an exception allowing that type of abortion to be used in cases where the woman's health is in danger. The only exception to the ban is when the mother's life is at risk.

Supporters of the ban say that a health provision would have rendered the legislation virtually meaningless because of the broad definition of maternal health given by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1973 in its decisions to legalize abortion.

New York District Judge Richard C. Casey said in August that the Supreme Court has clearly called for health exceptions in such laws, and San Francisco federal Judge Phyllis Hamilton said in June that the law's lack of exceptions "poses an undue burden on a woman's right to choose an abortion."

The Justice Department has already appealed the San Francisco ruling striking down the ban. The partial-birth abortion cases are expected to be appealed eventually to the Supreme Court.

The Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act was signed into law by President Bush last November, but the federal judges in San Francisco, New York and Nebraska each issued temporary restraining orders to prevent enforcement of the ban in response to lawsuits filed by Planned Parenthood Federation of America and the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of the National Abortion Federation and the Center for Reproductive Rights.

The law bars a type of abortion that is usually performed in the second or third trimester. In the procedure, a live fetus is partially delivered, then the skull is punctured to sever the brain stem before the whole body is delivered. Under the law, doctors who perform such abortions, which are also known to physicians as "intact dilation and extraction," are subject to up to two years in prison.

"We are hopeful that the ban on partial-birth abortion ultimately will be upheld," said Ruse. "But no matter how the legal questions are finally resolved, these trials will have accomplished something extremely significant: They will have gotten the abortion industry on the record, under oath, admitting the horrifying truth about abortion."

Meanwhile, in a separate statement on another abortion-related matter, Ruse said she was pleased that testimony on the aftereffects of abortion was included in a Sept. 29 hearing conducted by the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Health on "Improving Women's Health: Understanding Depression After Pregnancy."

The hearing, which was chaired by Rep. Michael Bilirakis, R-Fla., included testimony from a woman who said she suffered profoundly after her abortion and a physician who has researched the physical and psychological effects of induced abortion.

"After 31 years, abortion continues to be an unchecked and unstudied experiment on women," said Ruse. "We are grateful to Chairman Bilirakis for shedding light on the reality of women's experience with abortion."

"For all of our education and beliefs that we live in a society that values women, abortion continues to be the biggest assault against women," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life ministry. "The fall-out to a woman who as had an abortion is immense and may take years for her to heal. We must continue to speak the truth: abortion hurts women."

Dr. Elizabeth Shadigian, a professor of obstetrics at the University of Michigan, testified that her research has shown links between induced abortions and an increased risk of suicide, preterm birth and breast cancer.

Pope beatifies five, including nun who inspired Gibson film

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Advancing the sainthood causes of five Europeans, Pope John Paul II beatified the nun whose visions inspired Mel Gibson's film, "The Passion of the Christ."

Blessed Anne Catherine Emmerich, the pope said, showed heroic patience and firm faith in dealing with years of ill health. The pope did not mention the German mystic's controversial book of visions on Christ's final days, for which she is best known.

Biographies of the newly beatified were read aloud at the start of the Oct. 3 Mass in St. Peter's Square. Some 20,000

Jesus Christ." A few of the details in the book made it into his film — as when Mary and Mary Magdalene use towels furnished by Pontius Pilate's wife to wipe up the blood of the scourged Christ.

Jewish leaders have said the negative portrayal of Jews in her writings was picked up and popularized by the Gibson film.

The biography in the beatification Mass booklet said Blessed Emmerich's words have reached innumerable people and represent "an outstanding proclamation of the Gospel." But her mystic writings received only a passing reference during the Mass, and the pope did not mention them at all in his sermon.

Before the liturgy, Vatican experts said the writings had been discarded as evidence during the sainthood review process because it was uncertain whether she actually wrote the book.

Sister Emmerich was practically illiterate, and her visions were transcribed and elaborated by a popular romantic poet, Clemens Brentano, who published them after Sister Emmerich's death at age 49 in 1824.

The four others beatified were:

— Austrian Charles I, who died in exile in 1922 and had a commitment to Christian values.

— French Father Joseph-Marie Cassant, a Cistercian monk who was best known for his prayer life and his devotion to the Eucharist. He died of tuberculosis in 1903 at the age of 25.

— Italian Sister Ludovica de Angelis, a member of the Daughters of Our Lady of Mercy, who gained fame for her work at a church-run children's hospital in Buenos Aires. She died in 1962.

— French Father Pierre Vigne, an "itinerant missionary" of the 17th and 18th centuries, who would sometimes carry his confessional on his back as he walked through rural France. His devotion to the Eucharist led him to found the Congregation of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament. He died at the age of 70 in 1740.

people, including several hundred European royalty, applauded when tapestry portraits of the five "blesseds" were unveiled on the face of St. Peter's Basilica.

The pope praised Blessed Emmerich's identification with the suffering of Christ, noting that she bore the stigmata, the wounds of the crucifixion. She entered an Augustinian convent in 1802, where she was bedridden for years. She soon became known for her visions of the supernatural and "conversations" with Jesus.

Gibson said he was inspired to make his movie after reading Sister Emmerich's book of visions, "The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord and Savior

Though disheartened, we can still find salvation through God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Kathy first learned that she had breast cancer two years ago. She was mildly concerned, but, buoyed by advances in cancer treatment, she and her family set about the business of fighting the disease.

Kathy is a popular, involved member of her church community, which was alarmed by her diagnosis and immediately provided strong spiritual and moral support to her, her husband Tom and teen-age children. Parishioners have prayed for her every Sunday at Mass in the Prayers of the Faithful.

Meanwhile, she continues her active participation in parish life — always visible in the choir and always obviously missing when she is in the midst of a round of chemotherapy. She and Tom work at keeping their spirits up despite suffering setback after setback in dealing with a cancer that is particularly resistant to treatment.

They constantly pray, while maintaining normalcy in their children's lives. She constantly prays, while continuing to be an interested, supportive mom, even as a daughter graduates from high school and goes off to college and as a son enters high school and works on his Boy Scout Eagle project. She prays and keeps up her routine of driving him to activities and attending important family, church and school events.

Appearing alternately healthy and frail, as her doctors try numerous, different treatments, she has been resolute in simply living life as well as she can and praying.

The cancer has spread now to her liver and brain, and one recent weekend after beginning yet another kind of treatment she was at church, in the choir, seemingly at peace. Just before Mass started she walked over to her mother, who sat in a wheelchair at the end of the front pew next to Tom. She gave her a kiss. At the Prayers of the Faithful, Kathy's name was spoken, and we all said, "Lord, hear our prayer."

And today's Gospel reminds us that if we call out to God day and night, as Moses did when he tired, as Jesus did when he wearied and as Kathy does when she is disheartened and in pain, God will hear our prayer and bring salvation.

As FCC starts new digital TV push, new public interest rules urged

WASHINGTON (CNS) — As the Federal Communications Commission launched a major new joint industry-government education campaign Oct. 4 to speed up America's switch to digital television, protesters outside FCC headquarters called on the commission to spell out broadcasters' public interest obligations.

The protesters were leaders of the Public Interest, Public Airwaves Coalition, a diverse group of 25 religious and civic organizations seeking to reverse the near-collapse of public interest broadcasting in the wake of deregulation over the past decade.

"We strongly urge the commission to include the public interest in any discussion of the digital television transition," nine coalition members said in a Sept. 30 letter asking FCC Chairman Michael Powell to include consumer or public interest representatives along with the TV industry executives on the two educational panels that followed the press conference.

Among the signers was Katherine Grincewich, assistant general counsel of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, one of several religious organizations in the coalition.

"A public education campaign that fails to include the public perspective and the public interest is a charade," the coalition members said.

In digital television (DTV), a broadcaster transmits sound and pictures as a stream of millions of discrete information bits, unlike the analog waves that form standard radio and TV transmissions.

The FCC plans to drop analog TV broadcasting when 85 percent of homes in a broadcast area have digital capability, but Powell said that the question of how the 85 percent will be counted is still "hotly contested." He said public safety needs are among top priorities for use of the old broadcast frequencies when they are freed up.

The Coalition said an education campaign on DTV ought to "include the interests and concerns of the American public" and "tell Americans not only what is available from a technical point of view, but also how digital television will serve them."

"The commission needs to inform Americans how digital television has the potential to ensure that Americans have greater access to public affairs programming especially related to local civic and electoral affairs," it said.

The coalition sharply criticized the commission for not addressing the issue of federal public interest rules in the DTV age. "Nearly five years after the FCC posed the question of how television broadcasters should serve the public interest with their increased digital capacity, the FCC remains silent," it said.

Two weeks earlier the coalition praised a vote in the Senate Commerce Committee amending a broadcast-related bill to require the FCC to establish "minimum quantitative guidelines for locally originated programming, local electoral and public affairs programming and independently produced programming for television broadcast licensees."

How much difference one person can make

Even small kindnesses are worthwhile

Do you ever wonder if one person can make a difference in the world? If so, think about this.

In 1989, Armenia was hit with a devastating earthquake. In just four minutes, 30,000 people died as buildings collapsed in ruins.

Just after the earthquake struck, a man was seen running toward the city, looking for his young son. He always had promised his son, "Armand, no matter what happens, I will be there for you."

The man ran toward his son's elementary school, but when he arrived all he found was a heap of rubble. He walked to where he believed his son's classroom was located and with his bare hands he began to dig.

"Don't bother," a bystander moaned in grief. "They're all dead."

"I promised my son I would be there for him," the father replied. "Are you going to stand there and criticize or are you going to help me?"

Silently the bystander began to work alongside the father, moving slabs of concrete and shards of glass. Others joined in. For hours on end they worked.

Eventually the others grew tired, leaving the father alone to dig into the night. For 24 hours he dug. Thirty hours. Thirty-two. His hands were bloody and his body ached, but still he dug.

After 34 hours he thought he heard a faint sound beneath him. "Armand, is that you?" the father sobbed.

"Papa!" a small voice called.

The man shouted for help and soon a crowd gathered to dig out his son. But it wasn't just Armand. They quickly found another child, then another. When they were finished, 14 of the 32 children were saved.

As the father carried his son to safety, Armand was heard calling to his classmates: "See? Didn't I tell you that my father would be there for me?"

That's an extreme example, but even in everyday life, one person can make a difference. I know, because it happened to me.

I'd just finished the saddest day of my life as I watched my younger sister die. The next day I bumped into an acquaintance who was anxious to help, especially when she learned that my older sister and her family would be arriving from across the country later that day, and that I had to feed and house 13 people overnight before heading out of state for the funeral.

Two hours later there was a knock at the door. This same woman was standing on our doorstep holding dinner for 13: two huge casseroles, an enormous salad, bread, warm brownies and a bottle of wine. I've never forgotten her kindness.

We often feel that a situation is so overwhelming that we can't possibly change it. But even small kindnesses are worthwhile.

There is a story told about a guy who was strolling on the beach when he discovered thousands of starfish that had been washed up onto the sand and were quickly dying. One by one, the man began to toss the starfish back into the water.

A bystander scoffed at him. "There are thousands of them! You can't possibly make a difference!"

The beachcomber silently picked up a starfish, tossed it into the water and replied, "I just made a difference to that one."

Even if we cannot overcome the huge problems of the world, we can make a difference in our little corner. If you don't believe me, just ask Armand.

Pope speaks of marriage commitment, prays couples have children

CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II dedicated his Oct. 6 general audience to married couples who live their commitment to each other with intensity and joy, and he prayed they would bring children into the world.

During the audience in St. Peter's Square, the pope also asked Catholics to celebrate the Oct. 7 feast of Our Lady of the Rosary and to make the rosary "your daily prayer."

Pope John-Paul read only six sentences of his prepared text about the second half of Psalm 45, the wedding hymn for the messianic king, which is used in the church's evening prayer.

The pope said the psalm's celebration of marriage "permits us to dedicate it to all spouses who live their marriage with intensity and interior freshness."

Greeting Spanish-speaking pilgrims, the pope said, "We pray to the Lord for all married couples called to offer new life, the continuation of civilization and of the history of salvation."

The pope's remarks came five days after the Cabinet of the Spanish government — in a move strongly opposed by the Catholic Church — approved a bill that would allow homosexuals to marry and adopt children.

The Spanish Parliament is scheduled to vote on the draft bill later this fall. If the legislation passes, Spain would become only the third country in the world to legalize gay marriages, after the Netherlands and Belgium.

In his main talk, the pope said it was revealing how Psalm 45 "exalts the woman: she is 'all glorious,' and this magnificence is expressed in her wedding gown, threaded with gold and enriched with precious embroidery."

"The Bible loves beauty as a reflection of the splendor of God himself," the pope's prepared text said. "Even clothing can be a sign of blazing interior light and of a soul's brightness."

It is no coincidence, the text said, that the wedding hymn ends with a prayer for the couple's future children.

Fertility is a "reality radically inserted in matrimony," the pope's text said. "The future, not only of the dynasty (of the psalm's couple) but of humanity, is possible precisely because the couple offers new creatures to the world."

"This is a relevant theme for our time, in the West so frequently incapable of entrusting its existence to the future through the generation and safeguarding of new creatures," the text said.

New generations, educated in love and responsibility, are the future of all civilizations and, through them, God will continue to carry out the salvation he wills for all people, it said.

The Vatican's English summary of the pope's text called marriage "a life-altering event and an authentic sign of the 'great mystery' of the Father's love for humanity and Christ's love for his church."

Respecting the sanctity of creation as St. Francis did

On a summer day, I was treated to a private tour of spectacular gardens in Massachusetts by Charlie Spencer, who I had known as a radio talk-show host in Springfield, Mass. We had talked by phone several times about our faith and the saints we love, and how our lives were shaped by the powerful biblical truths that took root in us.

But we found we had another common ground — our love for all of creation according to the teachings and example of St. Francis of Assisi.

At Stanley Park in Westfield, Spencer supervises the care of an immense, impressive American wildflower garden. He said he chose to work nurturing wildflowers "because each one has a name." In this he expressed his deep respect for the individuality of each one of God's woodland "creatures."

Spencer is one of 18,000 Third Order Franciscans in the United States and a member of the U.S.-based Ecology Commission of the Secular Franciscan Order. He called St. Francis "the patron saint of ecology," noting that it was fitting that his followers would place importance on "developing a 'brother and sister' relationship to all creation."

This would make us peacemakers, like St. Francis, bringing witness to the many forms of earthly desecration "caused by ignorance or injustice."

Spencer founded "National Wildflower Week," now sponsored by his secular Franciscan order, and is responsible for introducing about 500 wildflower gardens around the United States. Spencer's wildflower work is inspired by St. Francis' teaching on our "kinship to creation," which the great saint underscored because he saw that humankind was always in danger of forgetting the sanctity of creation.

Spencer has long known that because of his mentor, St. Francis, who removed from the road even little worms, "lest they be crushed under foot."

In sharing his love of wildflowers with me, Spencer reminded me of how and why St. Francis, looking at the humblest of plants, would be moved to praise God!

How to rediscover peace

Sharing time leads to inner calm

On a recent drive back from Chicago to Washington, I stopped at my favorite resting place, St. Vincent's Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa. It is a monastery with a college, so it bustles with activity. Yet, when I am there I am at peace.

While staying overnight, I fell asleep to the melodious sound of crickets and awoke to singing birds. A better accompaniment to restfulness you could not find.

On my way to breakfast, I looked out over the countryside surrounding the monastery — rolling hills dotted by trees and lush fields. I allowed the wonder of God's peace to fill me.

On this particular visit, I learned yet another lesson about peace. Peace is generated by wholesome sharing. Many of the monks have become close friends — people with whom I can share my ideas freely, especially my inner feelings. In my conversations with them, I have had this experience often, even though it is momentary. We connect and are "all there" for each other.

Interestingly, the wonderful theologian Father Romano Guardini defined the power of stillness and peace as "being all there." He meant that we're all there when we focus our whole being on another, leaving self out of the picture.

On that same trip home, I happened to stay at a rectory in order to meet with a friend who was visiting there. While there, the pastor came in, sat down and gave us his undivided attention. He was "all there" with us. Though I only stayed overnight, it was so refreshing to experience this hospitality and to feel at one with him.

As I reflected on this, it dawned on me that as bad as the priesthood shortage is, if we who are priests could be "all there" for each other, even though momentarily, we would not only find the strength to carry on, but probably would be a happier priesthood and attract more vocations. I believe this holds true for all of us facing tensions and seemingly hopeless situations.

When we feel someone is all there for us, it tends to free us up to be ourselves. Buried problems come to the surface and are aired out. Exciting aspirations are shared. New insights are generated. Hope is revived. What is more important, our spirit is refreshed and renewed.

When an Italian says that he or she is doing well, a phrase that is used is "non si preoccupare" — I am not preoccupied. In other words, I am not being torn apart by going in many directions. I am focused and "all there."

Today it is so easy to be preoccupied by events or concerns that destroy our peace. The daily news more often than not is disturbing, and no matter where we look we can't seem to find serenity. If you feel you are at the end of your rope, find a friend who is all there for you and be all there for him or her.

Spend time sharing, and see if it doesn't restore that inner calm you seek.

How to make a 4-year-old laugh

Uncle Dan

Want to make a 4-year-old crack up? Make her think you are the funniest thing since the dog chewing peanut butter?

Say, "So, tell me about SquareBob SpongePants."

After he or she has composed himself or herself, the 4-year-old will say, "No, it's SpongeBob SquarePants."

"What's the difference?" I asked.

"It's SpongeBob SquarePants."

"You just said that," I replied. "So why can't you call him SquareBob SpongePants?"

More laughing.

"Hey," I said defending myself, "the guy is square and he is a sponge, so why can't we call him SquareBob SpongePants?"

Until recently the name "SpongeBob SquarePants" had no significance to me. Then I learned that SpongeBob is my granddaughter Melody's favorite cartoon character.

Yes, it was important that I watch an episode of SpongeBob with her.

Now I know a lot about SpongeBob. He is a sea sponge, but he looks like a dried-out kitchen sponge crossed with a hunk of Swiss cheese. (Please don't tell Melody I said that.)

SpongeBob lives in a pineapple in a place called Bikini Bottom. His friends include a starfish, who also wears pants, and a squirrel named Sandy Cheeks (who wears a dive get-up that makes him look like an underwater astronaut).

I squinted at Melody. "Are you sure?" I asked. "Are you sure his name is not SpongeSquare BobPants?"

"Nooooo. (Giggle.) It's SpóngéBob SquarePants. (Giggle.)"

"Oh," I sighed, "I'm glad you told me. I thought it was SpongePants SquareBob."

"SpongeBob, SpongeBob."

"Does that mean his mother and father are Mr. and Mrs. SquarePants? Do they live in a pineapple, too?"

About that time Melody's mother made an appearance on the front porch steps where we had been staging our SpongeBob seminar.

"What are you two up to out here?" she asked.

"Nothing," said Melody.

"Nothing," I repeated.

My daughter looked suspicious. "There had better not be any ideas floating around out here about slipping the dog a spoonful of peanut butter," she warned.

The 'Roe Effect'

Pro-choice movement is 'killing' itself

Guest Column

RUSE, Esq.
GUEST COLUMNIST

We've all seen the fabulously popular and ubiquitous Frank Capra flick, "It's a Wonderful Life." We know the bittersweet post-war tale of how the lives of the people of Bedford Falls were touched by George Bailey, and how different things would have been if he had never existed.

It's a great lesson in the principle that absences have consequences.

Thirty-one years after Roe v. Wade, it's impossible to imagine what life would be like if those 40 million people were among us today. But odds are they would have been very much like us — going to school, getting jobs, raising families. And voting.

Their missing votes is what Wall Street Journal reporter James Taranto calls the "Roe Effect."

The Roe Effect theorizes that "pro-choice" women are more likely to have abortions than pro-life women, and that children tend to espouse the views of their parents. Thus, there are fewer and fewer children growing up to become pro-choice adults — and this, according to the theory, has political ramifications.

Larry Eastland, discussing the Roe Effect recently in The American Spectator, said the children who were aborted instead of born in any given year could be considered "Missing Voters" 18 years later, the year they would have reached voting age. He calculated that abortions from 1973 to 1982 resulted in approximately 13 million Missing Voters in the 2000 election. Even taking into account the fact that not all possible voters become actual voters in any given election, the closeness of the last election can leave no doubt about the significance of millions of missing votes.

Now skip ahead four years. A whole new group of young people has reached voting age since the last election but missing among them are those who were aborted from 1982 to 1986. Thus, the total number of Missing Voters in the upcoming election will be 19 million.

"Like an avalanche that picks up speed, mass and power as it thunders down a mountain," Eastland wrote, "the number of Missing Voters from abortion changes the landscape of politics."

But can we know how they would have voted? No, of course not. Still, as a general proposition, children tend to absorb the values of their parents, including their political views, and tend to develop the same lifestyle as their family. So if pro-lifers beget pro-lifers, then pro-choicers beget pro-choicers — unless they abort them instead.

A recent Wirthlin Worldwide survey found that, of the Americans who call themselves politically "conservative," 25 percent are having abortions. In contrast, 40 percent of self-described political "liberals" are having abortions. As Eastland wrote, "Liberals have been remarkably blind to the fact that every day the abortions they advocate dramatically decrease their power to do so."

It's the classic Pyrrhic victory.

Catholics have sometimes been accused of promoting large families as a means of gaining social or political control — a claim that is absurd on its face. But if the Roe Effect is true, then it's not a stretch to say that the "pro-choice" movement is quite literally killing itself.

GUARDIAN ANGEL

Prisoner's faith, prayers touch lives of fellow inmates

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

WAYNESVILLE — People yell and scream, music blares, but Oliver Wells isn't distracted.

Lying on his bunk, one of 46 in a long room in the North Carolina Department of Correction's minimum-security prison in Waynesville, Wells is praying. It's his solace during his 32-month prison sentence, his respite after another day working for the N.C. Department of Transportation.

He serves as a flagman, runs the wood chipper, dumps stone. Lately, he has been cutting trees and rebuilding roads washed away in the hurricanes. Recently Wells, who will be 74 on Oct. 15, put in an 86-hour week. He's paid 7.5 cents an hour.

Often his prayers are for others: an inmate's mother who had a stroke, a DOT employee paralyzed when a falling tree broke his back.

Another DOT employee asked Wells to pray for the man who was near death. Wells and Rev. Mr. Gerard LaPointe, a deacon at St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, have both prayed; the man can now move his hands and is alert.

"We've had such good results that I can't say enough about prayer," Wells said. "I lay on my bunk and say what I want to the Lord and go through the rosary."

Other inmates are curious about those beads.

"They see me do the rosary at night and they come over and say, 'Can I ask you what that is?' so I show them," Wells said.

"I read the ('Liturgy of the Hours') every day," Wells also reads the Bible and uses a lector workbook, which has commentaries, to help him understand the Sunday readings.

"And all of this is because of Jerry," he said.

Rev. Mr. LaPointe gave Wells the books. He visits the prison to conduct a weekly Communion service.

"When he comes over on Monday night, it's very important to me," Wells said. "Consequently, the younger inmates see this."

His calm demeanor and deepening faith draw other inmates who ask to read passages from Wells' Bible, seek his advice on adjusting to life in prison and how to get work after they leave. He's talking to another inmate who has said he was raised Catholic but hadn't been to church in years; now, he too is planning to attend the Communion service.

"I don't go to other people, they come to me," Wells said.

He's honest with them, as well as during his talks with Rev. Mr. LaPointe.

"He hasn't tried to hide anything from me," Rev. Mr. LaPointe said. "I feel that what he's been doing to help these other inmates, he's a guardian angel for (them). He gives them of his knowledge what will help them."

Part of his Catholic upbringing, he said, was "that you had to get up and do," but also included devotions: "Since I was a little kid, I've loved the Stations of the Cross, the ultimate sacrifice for people you never knew."

Football scholarships financed Wells bachelor's degree. Later, he earned a master's in cost accounting at McGill University in Montreal. He and wife, Ingeborg, have four grown children, seven grandchildren and a great-grandchild, and they have stood by him.

In fact, he said, the hardest thing is being separated from them. He calls Ingeborg weekly: "She's my strength, my backbone."

He and his wife, who is of a different faith, raised their children Catholic, and she continues to attend Mass frequently. Wells, however, didn't always make time for church; he was too busy with his contracting and manufacturing businesses.

Prison has changed that when he was incarcerated for what he described as a nonviolent crime involving money but not drugs.

Wells began attending the Communion service in the prison. He and Rev. Mr. LaPointe started talking.

"It's very comfortable," Wells said. "I've said to Jerry, 'Religion isn't preaching.' God directs you to things. I believe in my heart that I'm here for a reason other than just the law of North Carolina."

One reason, he thinks, is increased tolerance.

"I've learned to accept a lot of people at face value," he said. "It doesn't cost you anything to sit and listen."

It's one of the things Rev. Mr. LaPointe has taught him.

"To me," Wells said, "preaching is 'I'm going to prove a point to you and the stronger I can yell, the stronger the point.' Jerry never preaches; he listens. To him, the homily is not preaching but explanation."

Wells has earned the prison's Level 2 status, which allows him six-hour-a-week sponsored passes. Rev. Mr. LaPointe takes him to Mass at St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

Although he misses the "mystery" of the Latin Mass, he likes participating. He doesn't think he'll be spending as much time working once he's out of prison.

"There's a lot of things that I can slow down and do, and I don't have to get away from my religion," he said. "I thought that I had to be in the plant 99 percent of the time. Now I know I don't have to."

FAITH IN ACTION

Benedictine Sister Elaine Fisher works on renovating the Dooley Center, a retirement facility in Atchison, Kan. The 38-year-old nun is director of maintenance at Mount St. Scholastica Monastery in Atchison. Sister Elaine says she can do almost any job the community may need done, but she admits electrical work is not really her forte.

Benedictine nun takes her order's 'prayer and work' motto to heart

ATCHISON, Kan. (CNS) — Benedictine Sister Elaine Fischer knows full well how to blend work with prayer.

The 38-year-old, who is the director of maintenance at Mount St. Scholastica Monastery in Atchison, describes her job as a ministry and says it is "a real privilege for me to be in charge of the stewardship of these buildings."

She has had a hand in "keeping the place up" ever since she joined the community 17 years ago. And while lay people might think it unusual to see a sister building cabinets, gluing PCV pipe together or smashing gypsum board with a hammer, it makes perfect sense to her based on the Benedictine motto "ora et labora" ("prayer and work").

"What Sister Elaine does is very close to St. Benedict's vision of what monastics do," said Benedictine Sister Irene Nowell, director of ongoing formation at the monastery.

"She works in caring for the land and the other material things we have in the buildings," said Sister Irene. "She also has the other side, in regard to her prayer life and participation as one of six sisters on the prioress's advisory council."

Sister Elaine agrees. "The 'Rule of Benedict' talks about manual labor and how important it really is, as well as reading and praying and your community life," she said.

Manual labor comes naturally to the nun. Growing up on a family farm, she learned to operate and maintain all kinds of farm machinery at an early age.

That experience made her more than capable of tackling almost any task.

In fact, when Sister Elaine first started working in maintenance, she also worked part time as a firefighter and an emergency medical technician. But she eventually stopped that work because she felt that it interfered too much with her community and prayer life.

Now she is responsible for a 60-acre campus with 16 buildings and a cemetery. The buildings range in size from small sheds to the five-story administration building of the former Mount St. Scholastica College.

She prefers making furniture and carpentry work along with gardening, mowing and landscaping.

"But everything intrigues me," she said. "I'm kind of 'a jack of all trades' and not a master of any."

"I wish she was out for hire," said Gary Kearney, a local contractor, "because I'd hire her."

Nations ignoring nuclear disarmament treaty, says Vatican official

NEW YORK (CNS) — Failure by nuclear and non-nuclear states to adhere to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty increases the possibility that terrorists will acquire such weapons, said the Vatican representative to the United Nations.

The 1968 treaty is in a "fragile state" because the "original bargain" of "no proliferation in exchange for nuclear disarmament" is not being observed, said Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's permanent observer at the United Nations in New York.

Instead, there has been an "ongoing struggle" between the non-nuclear countries to obtain weapons and the nuclear nations to further modernize their weapons, he said Oct. 7 at a meeting of the General Assembly's First Committee, a subcommittee that deals with disarmament and international security.

"Proliferation of these weapons greatly increases the likelihood of terrorist acquisition," he said.

An overall rise in global military spending also makes it easier for terrorists to get conventional weapons, he said.

Worldwide military spending this year is expected to top $1 trillion and "will soon surpass even the Cold War peaks," he said.

Global military spending in 2003 was $965 billion, a jump of 11 percent from 2002, said the archbishop.

Conventional weapons "are being produced and sold internationally, on black markets as well as by state sponsors," he said.

Tighter export controls and greater monitoring of weapons stockpiles are needed, he added.

"Increased reliance on guns — large and small — is leading the world away from, not toward, security," he said.

Disarmament efforts must include stopping the spread of conventional weapons in Africa and other regions facing conflict, he said.

Vatican to publish catechism on church social teachings Oct. 25

Compendium 'indispensible instrument,' says cardinal

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The long-awaited catechism on church social teachings will be published Oct. 25 by the Vatican's Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

The council said in a statement Oct. 8 that the "Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church" is divided into three parts that present the foundations, contents and pastoral applications of Catholic social teachings.

Pope John Paul II endorsed the idea of a catechism of social doctrine in 1999, and the Vatican hoped it might be ready during Holy Year 2000.

The preparation and review, which included consultation with experts and bishops' conferences, took longer than anticipated.

The compendium will be unveiled at the start of this fall's plenary assembly of the pontifical council.

Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the council, called the compendium "an indispensable instrument for announcing and implementing the Gospel."

He said it would help Catholics make the necessary "moral and pastoral discernment of the complex events that characterize our times."

Part of the catechism is expected to deal with the theological and anthropological underpinnings of the church's social teaching, as well as a wide range of classical social doctrine themes, said Cardinal Martino.

Vatican says it favors reforms of U.N. Security Council

NEW YORK (CNS) — The U.N. Security Council should be reformed so that it better represents the world's population, geopolitical regions, economic groups and civilizations, said the Vatican representative to the United Nations.

Such revisions would "improve the credibility and efficacy of the reformed Security Council," said Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's permanent observer to the United Nations.

Reforms must also improve the "actual capacity and political will to contribute substantially to reach the goals that constitute a priority for the overall majority of the member states," he said.

The archbishop spoke at an Oct. 4 session of the U.N. General Assembly that was held to discuss ways to revitalize and strengthen the United Nations.

The Security Council is the United Nations' most powerful body. It is the only body whose decisions are obligatory on member states and the only one authorized to enforce resolutions through military action.

The council is composed of five permanent members and 10 rotating members elected to two-year terms. The permanent members are the United States, United Kingdom, Russia, China and France.

Archbishop Migliore stopped short of suggesting that the veto power over decisions held by the five permanent members be ended. The veto, known as the rule of "great power unanimity," means that no substantive decision can be approved by the council if at least one of the permanent members votes against it.

"For practical reasons, not all the bodies of the United Nations can be arranged on the model of the General Assembly," said the archbishop.

In the General Assembly, each state has one vote and no state has a veto.

Regarding general U.N. reforms, Archbishop Migliore said that "the nations that have attained a superior degree of scientific, cultural and economic development have the responsibility to make a greater contribution to the common cause."

The United Nations "needs to become a more outward-looking organization capable of listening more carefully to the needs and demands of the global community," he said.

"Changing historical conditions" reinforce the need for an international body such as the United Nations, he said.

"The universal common good is confronted with problems of worldwide dimensions; problems, therefore, which can be solved only by an authority possessed with power, organization and means coextensive with these problems and whose sphere of activity is worldwide," he said.

Local student walks halls of leadership in Washington

Youth leadership conference offers historic perspectives

GASTONIA — Lauren Caddick, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, joined 200 middle school students from throughout the United States at the Junior National Young Leaders Conference in Washington, D.C., Oct. 9-14.

Themed "The Legacy of American Leadership," the conference introduced young people to the rich tradition of leadership throughout U.S. history, while helping them develop their own leadership skills.

Caddick, who attends Cramerton Middle School in Cramerton, participated in educational activities and presentations led by individuals in high-level positions as well as young people who exercise leadership skills within their communities. Students also visited historic national landmarks, including Colonial Williamsburg, Va.

"By participating in the Junior National Young Leaders Conference, students such as Lauren Caddick learn early that young people are not only welcome in Washington, D.C., but they actually keep this city and our country running," said Mike Lasday, executive director of the Congressional Youth Leadership Council, the nonprofit, non-partisan organization that sponsored the conference.

"One of the goals of the conference is to encourage students to build their own leadership skills through active involvement within their communities," said Lasday.

In addition to examining notable U.S. leaders and historic figures, Caddick studied the impact of leadership throughout critical periods of U.S. history, including the Civil War and Reconstruction, World War II, the Great Depression and the Civil Rights Movement. Upon completion of the conference, students took home a greater sense of understanding of the role of individuals in U.S. democracy, as well as the responsibilities of being a leader.

Caddick, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. William Caddick in Gastonia, is also a Girl Scout and a member of her school's Junior Beta Club.

REACH (Resources, Education, Assistance, Counseling and Housing) of Haywood County, which assists victims of domestic violence. "They're so touched that someone who didn't even know they would care enough to do this."

"I decided to start making tote bags last fall after I had been to a St. Margaret Women's Guild meeting and Nancy Porter (of the guild) said REACH needed suitcases for the people entering the shelter," said Clare Danielewski, a parishioner at St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

"When a woman comes to the shelter, she usually just leaves home and has nothing," said Danielewski. "They may give her a pillowslip or trash bag to keep her belongings in."

Danielewski invited other women in the parish to help her make tote bags. From July through October (Domestic Violence Awareness Month), the Sewing Angels of St. Margaret of Scotland Church have given REACH 120 tote bags.

"The bag itself has taken many forms," said Danielewski, who based the design on a bag she bought years ago. "It was a growing process. First it was larger, then it became smaller, then it had one (exterior) pocket, then I came up with the idea of making two pockets, one for a cell phone, baby bottle or water bottle, and one for the important papers a woman uses when she's in the shelter."

An adult's bag is 19 inches square; pull up the lining and the bag doubles in size. Children's bags are 14 inches square. Most of the adult bags feature feminine-patterned fabric, but some have masculine designs. Although the majority of abuse victims are women, men can also be victims.

Close to home

In North Carolina in 2003, 71 people (55 women, 13 men and three children) died from domestic violence: killed by acid, shot, stabbed, strangled, drowned, beaten with fists or a pipe. A father killed his son as the son tried to protect his mother.

From July 2003 through June 2004, REACH of Haywood County dealt with 919 domestic violence and 506 sexual assault cases.

Whether or not the victims actually die, domestic violence is about the abuser controlling the abused. One husband repeatedly followed his wife to the bathroom and dictated how many sheets of toilet paper she could use. Another allowed his wife 28 minutes to go to the grocery store and painted her automobile headlights black so she couldn't drive at night.

"Their self-esteem is so low," Noland said. "When they come to us, they're at such a low point — they've been called names, hit, sexually abused — they don't feel they deserve anything. Abusers are con artists. They will use anything to get that person under their thumb."

The tote bag is often the only new thing the victim has.

Fabric stores and individuals donate much of the fabric for the tote bags, often sturdy tapestry in bright colors, and the Sewing Angels sell some bags to raise money for materials. However, Danielewski is adamant that all proceeds go back into the project.

The Sewing Angels meet in the parish hall on Wednesday mornings to work on the bags. The Angels complete some bags at home.

"Once you get the hang of it, it takes two to three hours (to make a bag)," said

Barbara Williams. "I enjoy sewing and when I saw it in the (church) bulletin, I thought that was something I'd be interested in. It seemed like a worthwhile cause. I enjoy the camaraderie of the ladies. (The sewing) just kind of sucks you in."

But the Sewing Angels' gifts of love aren't limited to Haywood County.

Angels abroad

Now the ministry has embraced Grace Uwimfura, originally from Rwanda and now living in Atlanta.

Speaking recently during the weekend Masses at St. Margaret of Scotland Church, Uwimfura asked for help for the Giving Back Foundation, which she founded to help African war widows and orphans.

Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church, met Uwimfura 10 years ago when he visited Notre Dame Sister Jane McAndrews, who was working in a Kenyan refugee camp.

Marauders had murdered Uwimfura's husband and their teen-age daughter in their home. Six months pregnant, Uwimfura and her three children fled to a camp, where they spent two years, often suffering from malnutrition.

With help from Sister McAndrews, Uwimfura and her children arrived in Atlanta. While in the camp, she had met Callixte, whose wife and six children had been murdered as he was forced to watch. They married in 1998.

Her life is good now, but she can never forget the refugee camp. "Domestic violence is high, women are often raped and many have HIV; there are no shelters, and people lack clothing and food," she said.

"When I left the refugee camp, women said, 'Remember us,'" Uwimfura said. "Now I have to give back. Now I can be the voice of the voiceless."

Inspired by Sister McAndrews, Uwimfura started the Giving Back Foundation.

"If you want to live, you can do it," Uwimfura said. "People who helped me were not Rwandese or African. Sister Jane was not African. She was a missionary with a heart, doing good things to give us hope. I watched what she did. I made this foundation to honor her name."

When Uwimfura visited the St. Margaret Women's Guild, Danielewski gave her a tote bag. Later, Uwimfura contacted Danielewski, asking to learn how to make the bags to give to refugees.

Uwimfura and Marta Yakoge are teaching others in the foundation to make the bags. When she visits the camps in November to assess the refugees' needs, Uwimfura will give them the bags as "an initial gift of hope."

She will also teach women not in the camps to make the bags so they can earn a living.

Uwimfura is still awed by the way St. Margaret of Scotland parishioners reached out to her and the help she received from the Sewing Angels.

"It shows how it doesn't matter about the color or the tribe or anything," Uwimfura said. "It shows how everyone can work together, people giving their talents. The women's guild here showed me the unity and love, so I'm living with that sign. This is the message I want to take back home, how people can love one another."

'VIVA MEXICO'

Celebration highlights Mexican independence

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ANDREWS — A nighttime call to arms, ordinary people gathered to shake off control of another nation.

Only this wasn't Paul Revere riding through sleeping Massachusetts villages on April 18, 1775, shouting that the British were coming.

This was Father Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla, who, shortly before dawn on Sept. 16, 1810, roused Mexican Indians and mestizos — people of mixed European and American Indian ancestry — in Dolores in the state of Guanajuato to strike for Mexican independence from Spain.

Mexico gained its independence in 1821. Today the priest is known as Father Hidalgo and the father of Mexico's independence.

Around 100 people, mostly Hispanic, many of them parishioners at Holy Redeemer Church, gathered the evening of Oct. 1 in the Andrews Recreation Center for a Mexican Independence Day celebration. Hurricanes hitting western North Carolina had prevented them from celebrating on the actual September date.

"So many Americans think Cinco de Mayo is Independence Day, but that celebrates Mexico defeating France," said Jose Martinez, a Holy Redeemer parishioner originally from Guanajuato.

On Cinco de Mayo (May 5) in 1862, Mexico defeated France in the Battle of Puebla.

"Guanajuato is where independence started," Martinez said. "On (the 16th) a priest was the one who convoked everybody to get up and get arms. He rang the bells and everybody came to the church. They were the poor; the rich didn't care."

This night the recreation center pulsed with music to set the blood pumping and feet dancing. Green, white and red paper banners declaring "Viva Mexico" (Father Hidalgo's cry to the peasants) were strung around the balloon-decorated hall.

Beneath a Mexican flag above the stage, DJs provided the music against a background of flashing colored lights. Adults danced; kids raced around the room chasing balloons.

Besides celebrating Mexican independence, the Hispanic community's goals were to have fun and, through ticket and food sales, raise money for the December celebration the community is planning in honor of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

"The principal meaning is to show people we can have fun without alcohol or drugs, that it's more family oriented," Martinez said.

The communitywide party turned out well.

"For the first one, I'm happy," said Father Michael Kottar, administrator of Holy Redeemer Church. "We have people here from Murphy and Hayesville (as well as Andrews)."

Dr. Darius Chrostowski, his wife, Beata, and their children, Emily and Eric, were among the non-Hispanic attendees. Holy Redeemer parishioners, they emigrated from Poland eight years ago and moved to Andrews from Chicago three years ago.

"It was a nice party, something different," Beata said. "A few years ago, there were not so many immigrants coming (here), but everywhere things are changing."

Hispanic ministry coordinators help welcome immigrants meeting of the eight coordinators Oct. 6, four of the coordinators and Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry discussed the challenges Hispanics face as newcomers to a sometimes-inhospitable land, and the accomplishments they have made.

The most important idea the coordinators wanted to convey was that Hispanics are "Catholic first, Hispanic second," said Eduardo Bernal, coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate.

Pedro Trinidad, coordinator for the Winston-Salem Vicariate, said it is a common misconception that all Hispanic immigrants are Mexican.

"We come from El Salvador, Colombia, Cuba," he said. "It is important to understand that we come from many places."

With the many countries that contribute to the immigrant Hispanic population, many Spanish dialects, cultures and celebrations come with them.

"It is a challenge to integrate cultures while keeping the faith we have as Catholics," said Eneidino Aquino, coordinator for the Greensboro Vicariate.

Churches throughout the diocese are making efforts to reach out to Hispanics. For the past six years, an annual retreat has taken place in the Asheville Vicariate aimed at strengthening faith programs and training laity. Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro offers a "Health and Hispanic Fair" that includes traditional music and dancing along with free health screenings.

"Catholics must stand up in support of Hispanics," said Bernal. "Talk to your Hispanic neighbors and find out about them. Invite them to church — Protestants do this."

"We must all go beyond the limitations of skin color and language barriers," he said. "Hispanics want to be invited into the community by Anglos."

Aquino said Anglos need to realize Hispanic immigrants are not coming to the United States to visit.

"They are here to stay," he said. "Make them feel at home."

In the coming years, Hispanics will make up the majority of Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte. There are already approximately 140,000 Hispanics living here. Eventually, Hispanics could make up as much as 85 percent of the Catholic population in western North Carolina, Bernal said.

"Soon, Hispanics will work in every department of the Pastoral Center, every parish will have a bilingual secretary," said Bernal. "We will be in every aspect of American society."

By no means should this be taken as a liability, said Sister Inkrott. "But rather it is a blessing, as the U.S. bishops stated in 'The Hispanic Presence.'"

Issued in 1983, "The Hispanic Presence, Challenge and Commitment, A Pastoral Letter on Hispanic Ministry" states, "At this moment of grace we recognize the Hispanic community among us as a blessing from God. We call upon all persons of good faith to share our vision of the special gifts which Hispanics bring to the Body of Christ, his pilgrim Church on earth."

"There follows a wonderful listing of the values the Hispanics exemplify that are central to the service of church and society," said Sister Inkrott, "such as respect for the dignity of each person, love for family life, sense of community, appreciation of the gift of life, devotion to Mary."

"I see Hispanics as being a 'wedge' to open up the existing cultures and allow new cultures in," said Sister Inkrott.

'BROTHERS AND SISTERS IN FAITH'

Parishes work to welcome Hispanics into fold

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR
AND CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — As the Hispanic population continues to grow in the Diocese of Charlotte, many parishes are working to meet the demands of that growth.

In addition to Spanish-language Masses, parishes across the diocese have instituted Hispanic ministry and Hispanic faith formation programs.

"I saw the need for such a ministry as soon as I arrived in Charlotte in July of last year," said Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church. "We had our first Spanish-language Mass last December and we now have a very steady ministry."

St. Vincent de Paul Church became the 50th of 93 parishes and missions within the diocese to have an active Hispanic ministry. The need was great, according to Father Lawlor, especially with nearby Protestant churches offering both religious and social services in Spanish.

Approximately 6,700 Hispanics live within the parish boundaries, according to the diocesan Office of Planning, and 75 percent of them identify themselves as Catholics.

"It follows then that approximately 5,000 Hispanic Catholics are currently living within our parish," said Father Lawlor.

More than 300 Hispanics regularly attend the Spanish-language Mass. The addition of the Mass was quite a change for some of the non-Hispanic members of the 40-year-old parish, said Father Lawlor.

"I have had to educate some on matters such as parish boundaries and the makeup of the universal church," said Father Lawlor. "As pastor, I am responsible for the pastoral care of all the Catholics who live within our parish. Our membership in the church is by virtue of baptism and not dependent on your financial status or even legal status."

Rev. Mr. Edwin Rodriguez recently transferred from Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe to assist with the new ministry.

"A couple of (non-Hispanic) parishioners have expressed their willingness to help out in such ways as teaching English," said Father Lawlor. "Others have attended the Mass to learn the Spanish language and have expressed that they enjoyed the liturgy."

It was standing room only for the Sept. 12 Spanish-language Mass at which Father Lawlor dedicated a statue of Our Lady of Charity of El Cobre, who was declared the patroness of Cuba by Pope Benedict XV in 1916.

"We now have a choir and have begun preparation for first penance and first Eucharist," said Father Lawlor.

At the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, sacramental preparation is offered in both English and Spanish.

"We pray in Spanish and in English when we meet together," said

Elizabeth Girton, director of faith formation at the basilica.

A Hispanic catechist works with parents who often speak little or no English and teaches them ways to prepare their children to receive the sacraments. Parents and children have books with English on one page and similar text in Spanish on the opposite page.

The catechists work cover the same material with both the English- and Spanish-speaking parents.

"All are learning the same thing at the same time," said Girton. "It works well. We've been doing it this way for five years."

Father C. Morris Boyd, parochial vicar, said the parish faith formation helps educate young people in two cultures. He said he hopes to help "integrate this (Hispanic) community into the whole parish and still keep the customs that also enrich ours."

A large number of parishioners attend the Spanish-language Mass on Sunday evenings. Father Boyd hears confessions in Spanish before the Mass.

Three Sundays a month, Father Boyd celebrates Mass in Spanish at the basilica and once a month at Immaculate Conception Church in Canton. Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor of the basilica, celebrates a monthly Spanish-language Mass.

A Hispanic youth group also meets on Sundays, a leadership group meets with adults and two small Christian community prayer and Scripture groups meet weekly in their homes. More groups are starting.

Father Boyd describes the Hispanic parishioners as dedicated Catholics.

"They live and breathe their faith," he said.

Opening the church doors to Hispanics is good for any parish, said Father Lawlor.

"Having another culture present reminds us that we are brothers and sisters in the one faith," he said.

Bishop celebrates bilingual confirmation Mass at basilica

CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — In his first visit as bishop to the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, Bishop Peter J. Jugis confirmed five youths at a bilingual Mass Sept. 25.

Typical of the basilica's diverse parish, three of the youths speak English as a second language. Although they hail from different ethnic backgrounds — including Hispanic, Vietnamese and Lithuanian — the youths prepared for their confirmation in their shared language of English.

The confirmation Mass, concelebrated by Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor of the basilica, was celebrated in both English and Spanish, with the five candidates for confirmation assisting.

Candidates Alicia Funderbunk, Jaime Gutierrez, Beverly Vu, Rebecca Sadelson and Gintaras Krulikas participated throughout the Mass as lectors.

During his homily, Bishop Jugis told the candidates that the "fullness of the Holy Spirit" would be with them to help guide them toward salvation.

"Life is not easy, especially if we want to be faithful to Christ and to the teachings he left us," said the bishop. "We need the Holy Spirit to stay on the path that will make us stay faithful. Happiness lies in living in communion with God and living life according to God's plan, his commandments."

The Holy Spirit "will be there to guide you, to show you the way," he said.

bryos, is now a laboratory reality.

As such, Catholic leaders and theologians believe people in the pews really need to understand the issue of stem-cell research, especially in light of the upcoming presidential election.

Stem-cell expert Father Tadeusz Pacholczyk said the debate on such research and the closely related issue of cloning is not just national in scope but international as the United Nations again faces the question of whether to ban all types of human cloning.

"To have an informed debate," said Father Pacholczyk, "people need to be aware of what the real parameters of the discussion are: What is a human embryo? What is cloning? What are stem cells, and from where do you get them? And what's the price that's going to be paid if we take stem cells from certain sources like living, growing human embryos?"

Father Pacholczyk, who holds a doctorate in neuroscience from Yale University and has completed advanced studies in Rome in theology and bioethics, is director of education at the National Catholic Bioethics Center in Philadelphia. He has served as a national spokesman on stem-cell research and presented congressional testimony.

Stem cells are basic cells capable of transforming themselves into the specialized cells present in specific body organs. Currently, embryonic stem-cell research involves embryos created in vitro by uniting a sperm and an egg in a laboratory.

Supporters of embryonic research say stem cells from embryos can be transformed into more types of specialized cells than adult stem cells can.

Father Pacholczyk said embryonic stem-cell research shows that the greatest promise for curing disease "is vastly over-sold."

Myths and misconceptions

Father Pacholczyk said the Catholic Church supports three of four types of stem-cell research, opposing only the use of embryonic stem cells.

Noting the Catholic Church runs the biggest network of hospitals in the world, the priest said the church "vigorously supports healing ... but always in a manner that respects true human dignity, without violating that dignity in order to achieve a cure."

"And embryonic stem-cell research represents a step where you violate human dignity in order to get what you want in the end — a possible cure. And that decision to violate the embryo is intrinsically objectionable, always," he added.

Father Pacholczyk charged the secular media with doing a poor job of reporting clearly the facts on these issues. He singled out two of his "10 great myths" on stem cell research as "really critical that people understand."

The first myth, he said, is that embryonic stem-cell research shows the greatest

promise. In reality, "the stress on the destruction of embryos as a way to bring about medical cures and miracles is vastly oversold. ... The true cures are coming from adult and umbilical cord stem cells. And people need to realize that."

Adult stem cells, he said, have existed and been in use for years. "So literally tens of thousands of people have already been cured of various ailments and treated for various disorders with adult stem cells," he said.

"And if you asked the question, 'How many people have been cured of any disease using stem cells from embryos?', the answer is exactly zero," said Father Pacholczyk. "Nobody has ever been cured of any disease yet."

He said it was pointless to wait "10 years or 20 years and invest hundreds of millions of dollars in a project that may fizzle. We have cures that work today."

Many supporters of embryonic research favor legalizing the cloning of human embryos solely for research purposes to provide more cells for investigation. This type of cloning is often called "therapeutic cloning."

Another key myth Father Pacholczyk said the public is being sold is the claim that therapeutic cloning and reproductive cloning are fundamentally different from one another.

"That is a smoke screen," the priest said. "Those two types of cloning do not differ from each other in the way that you make the cloned embryo. They're exactly the same."

"The creation of cloned embryos, either to make a baby or to harvest cells, occurs by the same series of technical steps," he said. "The only difference is what will be done with the cloned human embryo that is produced: Will it be given the protection of a woman's womb in order to be born, or will it be destroyed for its stem cells?"

Opposing sides

The June 5 death of former President Ronald Reagan, who suffered from Alzheimer's disease, revived the political debate over federal funding of human embryonic stem-cell research, which de facto destroys the embryos.

The debate surfaced even as many scientists favoring such research said stem cells hold out little hope for Alzheimer's patients, but offer promise in the fight against other major illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes and Parkinson's disease.

When it comes to stem-cell research, Republican President George W. Bush and Sen. John Kerry are on opposite sides of the debate.

Kerry has vowed to lift restrictions on stem-cell research instituted by Bush on Aug. 9, 2001. Bush restricted the use of federal funds for embryonic stem-cell research to cell lines that existed at that time.

"At this very moment, some of the most pioneering cures and treatments are right at our fingertips, but because of the stem-cell ban, they remain beyond our reach," Kerry said in an Aug. 7 radio address. "That is not the way we do things in America. Here in America, we don't sacrifice science for ideology."

In response, Bush said his administration was the first to actually fund stem-cell research, with his 2003 budget including $24.8 million for research on the existing embryonic stem-cell lines and $190 million in funding for adult stem cells.

"The principle that human embryos merit respect as a form of human life — and that the federal government should not encourage their destruction — has been accepted on a bipartisan basis for a number of years," says the Bush campaign Web site. "Every year since 1996, Congress has adopted legislative language stating that federal funds may not be used in research involving the destruction of human embryos."

Regarding cloning, Bush has said he would sign legislation banning all human cloning. A total ban bill has passed the House of Representatives and a similar bill is in the Senate. Kerry supports a rival Senate bill that would ban cloning for human reproduction but would allow the cloning of human embryos for medical research.

"Government has no business forcing taxpayers to support research that relies on the direct destruction of any human life," said Baltimore Cardinal William H. Keeler, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities.

Cardinal Keeler said that there is no need to experiment with embryonic stem cells because knowledge of stem cells has advanced through the use of morally acceptable adult stem cells, animal stem cells and embryonic stem cells eligible for funding under current Bush administration policy.

The initial promise of embryonic stem cells "was exaggerated," Cardinal Keeler said in a July 7 letter to the appropriations committees in the Senate and House of Representatives. The cardinal urged federal lawmakers to oppose efforts to include such federal funding in the appropriations bill for the Labor Department and the Health and Human Services Department.

Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, agrees.

In testimony before a Senate subcommittee Sept. 29, Doerflinger said

A microscopic view shows a colony of undifferentiated human embryonic stem cells being studied at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. The U.S. bishops oppose human embryonic stem-cell research because it requires the destruction of embryos.

"ethical errors" and "dwindling hopes of medical benefit" mitigate against public funding of embryonic stem-cell research.

"Congress should take stock now and realize that the promise of this approach is too speculative, and the cost too high," said Doerflinger before the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation's subcommittee on science, technology and space. He was one of five witnesses at the subcommittee's hearing on "Embryonic Stem-Cell Research: Exploring the Controversy."

"That cost includes the early human lives destroyed now and in the future, the required exploitation of women for their eggs and perhaps for their wombs, and the diversion of finite public resources away from research avenues that offer real reasons for hope for patients with terrible diseases," he added. "Let's agree to support avenues to medical progress that we can all live with."

Both Doerflinger and Cardinal Keeler have rejected the argument that human embryos that otherwise would be discarded can be used for experiments.

"The mere fact that some parents discard 'excess' embryos creates no argument that the federal government should intervene to assist in their destruction — any more than the fact that many abortions are performed in the U.S. creates an argument that Congress must use its funding power to promote such killing," said Doerflinger.

"The claim that humans who may soon die automatically become fodder for lethal experiments also has ominous implications for condemned prisoners and terminally ill patients," said Cardinal Keeler.

On the same day as the cardinal's July 7 letter, the results of a Le Moyne College/Zogby International polling project on contemporary Catholic trends were released, showing 73 percent of Catholics surveyed support adult stem-cell research and 63 percent feel that use of embryonic stem cells is morally wrong.

Church perspective

While the bishops do not endorse candidates, they do take stands on issues.

In their 2003 voter guideline document, "Faithful Citizenship: A Catholic Call to Political Responsibility," the bishops based their opposition to human embryonic stem-cell research and human cloning on the principle that human life begins at conception.

"The destruction of human embryos as objects of research is wrong. This wrong is compounded when human life is created by cloning or other means only to be destroyed," said the bishops' document.

"We call on government and medical researchers to base their decisions regarding biotechnology and human experimentation on respect for the inherent dignity and inviolability of human life from its very beginning, regardless of the circumstances of its origins," it says.

Regarding human cloning, separate statements by church officials have supported the total ban contained in a bill that passed the House in 2003 and in a Senate bill. Bush supports both bills.

Kerry supports a rival Senate bill that would ban cloning for human reproduction but allow it for research purposes, said a spokesman in Kerry's Senate office.

Catholic bioethicists have noted that the church's opposition to using embryonic stem cells is not a hindrance to research. They cite research with adult stem cells as more promising, since embryonic stem cells are said to be more unstable.

"Because scientists, and the for-profit companies that increasingly support and make use of their research, are always tempted to treat helpless members of the human family as mere means to their ends, the rest of society — including government — must supply the urgently needed barrier against unethical exploitation of human beings," said Doerflinger.

As with abortion and euthanasia, "the destruction of human embryos for stem-cell research is intrinsically evil and can never be justified because it directly targets and destroys innocent human life," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis. "There is a lot of work the church must do on many fronts."

Editor Kevin E. Murray and CNS writers Nancy Frazier O'Brien and Jean M. Schildz contributed to this story.

'Memory and Identity': In new book, pope looks back at 20th century

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — This month, Pope John Paul II's latest book has been unveiled — a 200-page reflection on the ideological struggles of the 20th century and their significance to all believers.

Due out in Italy in early 2005, "Memory and Identity: Conversations Between Millenniums" will be his third book in the space of two years.

Like some of the pope's previous books, this one was more than a decade in gestation. In recent months, he has returned to these unfinished projects with new focus, dictating changes and corrections to a Polish assistant.

Vatican officials insist that despite the pope's physical decline — the result of a nervous system disorder believed to be Parkinson's disease — he still has considerable creative energy. As evidence, they point to the pope's book of poems written in the summer of 2002, at a time when much of the world thought that he and his pontificate were running out of steam.

The Italian publisher, Rizzoli, describes it as "a historical and philosophical reflection on the use of freedom and its limits, on the concepts of homeland and nation, and on the Christian roots of Europe."

The idea for the book jelled in 1993, when the late Father Jozef Tischner, a fellow Pole and a philosopher in the pope's former Archdiocese of Krakow, proposed a series of conversations on the tumultuous events of the closing century — including the rise and fall of Nazism, fascism and European communism.

The pope was happy to oblige, and the two were joined by another philosopher friend, Krzysztof Michalski. Their many hours of conversation were tape-recorded; afterward, the transcripts sat in a drawer. Apparently, the pope felt it was better to let the century end before drawing definitive judgments.

Ten years later, the pontiff picked up the transcripts and set to work editing and correcting. According to excerpts released by Rizzoli, the pope sees the 20th century as a stage where good and evil did sharp battle.

The pope calls Nazism a form of "bestiality" whose true dimensions became known only after World War II.

"The full extent of the evil that was raging through Europe was not seen by everyone, not even by those of us who were living at the epicenter," he said.

"For a long time, the West did not want to believe in the extermination of the Jews. ... Not even in Poland did we know all that the Nazis had done," he said.

Here and in other places the pope tries to reconcile this obvious and horrendous evil with God's plan for humanity.

"Later, when the war was over, I thought to myself: The Lord God allowed Nazism 12 years of existence, and after 12 years the system collapsed. Evidently this was the limit imposed by divine providence upon that sort of folly," he said.

If communism had a longer run, there was meaning in that, too, he said.

"To me it was quite clear that communism would last much longer than Nazism had done. For how long? It was hard to predict. There was a sense that this evil was in some way necessary for the world and for mankind," he said.

Then he quotes from Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, a German poet and dramatist, and St. Paul, to make the point that sometimes evil is useful because it creates opportunities for good.

In his book, the pope is clearly reaching beyond the borders of his own church toward a wider audience. Rizzoli will try to make sure that can happen, as it seeks partner publishers in various languages around the world.

The pope already has tasted publishing success on a global scale with some earlier works. The autobiographical "Crossing the Threshold of Hope" has worldwide sales of more than 20 million since 1993, and the poetry volume, "Roman Triptych," has been translated into 20 languages since its release last year.

Common need for healing, forgiveness

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In the high political season now upon us, campaign charges and counter-charges explode around us like broadcast pipe bombs. It is easy to become indignant about one outrageous claim or another.

"How can they say that with a straight face?" we ask like-minded friends incredulously, angrily. "How can they twist the facts so deliberately? Resort to scare tactics so callously? Appeal to the baser instincts of the electorate so shamelessly?" we wonder.

When we experience divisive and bitter tactics, it is easy to feel a fierce sense of righteous anger. While most people don't deliberately court such feelings, it is difficult to deny their allure when circumstances place them in our path.

Deeply rooted in wounded human nature, there seems to be an instinct to find in the egregious flaws of others a way to minimize what we pretend are much less serious failings in ourselves. It is a delusion to which only a little reflection puts the lie, but it seems hard to resist.

Jesus knew well this primal strategy for distracting ourselves from our deep — and deeply disconcerting — need for mercy and conversion. To his first hearers, tax collectors were an obvious trigger for righteous indignation. They were despised as collaborators with the occupying Romans and betrayers of religious truth.

Contrasting them with the religiously correct Pharisees would incline listeners to anticipate the story's lesson: Admire the Pharisee, condemn the tax collector.

Jesus turns such self-serving logic on its ear. The public sinner at least has the grace to recognize his need before God; the publicly virtuous Pharisee is blind to the self-importance and spiritual pride which block the flow of God's grace.

As election day draws near and the opposing arguments grow more strident, may God's kindness reveal to us our common need for healing and forgiveness.

Question:

Reflecting on God's love for sinners, how can I find common ground with those whose politics I deplore?

Movie Capsule

NEW YORK (CNS) — The following is a capsule review of a movie recently reviewed by the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"Friday Night Lights"

Hard-hitting drama about a season in the life of a small-town high school football team as it struggles to make it to the Texas state championship. Based on a nonfiction best seller, the film is an engrossing, at times unsettling, portrait of the lives and fragile dreams of young athletes that exposes the unhealthy environment where teen-agers are asked to shoulder the expectations of an entire community.

Football violence; some underage drinking; two sexual situations, one with partial nudity; an abusive father-son relationship and some crude language. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

American Jewish Committee honors Dominican nun

Sister Thering honored for lifelong commitments

NEW YORK (CNS) — The American Jewish Committee awarded Dominican Sister Rose Thering its Jan Karski Moral Courage Award for her lifelong commitment to Christian-Jewish relations, her support for Israel and her opposition to anti-Semitism.

"Sister Rose has remained a vigorous champion of these causes through the years, and has been a remarkable inspiration, an authentic role model for thousands of Christians and Jews," said Rabbi James Rudin, the American Jewish Committee's senior interreligious adviser. "She defined her generation of Catholics and she changed history."

Sister Thering received the award during a recent board meeting of the committee.

In the 1960s, Sister Thering, in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee, conducted a groundbreaking study of textbooks used in Catholic schools. Because of her study, significant changes were made in the books' material about Jews, Judaism and the Holocaust.

Sister Thering taught at the Institute for Judeo-Christian Studies at Seton Hall University in New Jersey for more than 30 years. In addition to her teaching responsibilities, she founded the National Christian Leadership Conference for Israel, a broad-based membership group that builds Christian public support for the security and survival of Israel.

She led scores of study missions to Israel; participants always included Christian leaders from the United States and Canada, among them Catholics, Protestants and Eastern Orthodox. She was a national leader in the Soviet Jewry campaign and participated in a hunger strike to emphasize her commitment to freeing Soviet Jews.

This is the second time the American Jewish Committee has awarded the Jan Karski honor. Per Ahlmark, a Swedish politician, author and humanitarian, received the inaugural Karski award in May at the American Jewish Committee's annual meeting.

The award is named after a Polish Catholic diplomat who worked with the anti-Nazi underground during World War II and risked his life to tell world leaders about the extermination of the Jews.

Refugee camps becoming permanent homes coming adults with a lost childhood," said Archbishop Silvano M. Tomasi, a Vatican representative to U.N. and humanitarian organizations based in Geneva.

On Oct. 4, Archbishop Tomasi told the executive committee of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva that the rights that are supposed to be accorded to refugees "too often remain mere words."

Millions of people are denied the right to work, are dependent on food rations and often are allowed to move only within the strict confines of their camps, Archbishop Tomasi said. With many camps located in remote, poor regions, "refugees and local people are forced to compete for scarce resources," a situation that can spur further conflict, he said.

"The institutional capacity of the international community seems insufficient," he said, adding that not only are greater economic resources needed, but also "political will" if the refugee population is to be helped.

Developed countries "have a moral obligation to do something to prevent so much suffering," the archbishop said.

Sudanese refugees find shelter under a tree in the village of Nyala in the Darfur region of western Sudan in early June. Millions of Sudanese have fled from their homes to escape attacks by Arab militias and Sudanese government forces aimed at cleansing the population of non-Arab Muslims.

That includes urgent action on behalf of the thousands of refugees in the Darfur region of western Sudan, where he said 6,000 to 10,000 refugees are dying each month because of violence, lack of food and shortage of medicines.

The international community has condemned violence against the black African population by Arab militias that many say are at least partially backed by the Sudanese government; the United States has called the violence genocide.

"But the talk has not been followed by strong determination," Archbishop Tomasi said, adding that negotiations among contributing nations concerning financial resources to commit to the situation "are slow and difficult."

Many countries favor a plan to deploy African Union troops backed by Western countries, he said, but the logistics are difficult and it might be a few months before troops are in place.

Refugee camps, he said, "are supposed to be for emergencies, but protracted refugee situations are becoming almost the norm."

The best solution for bringing refugees back to their countries of origin is voluntary repatriation, which "does not mean just going back," Archbishop Tomasi said. There must be conditions of safety and dignity, he said, and the international community must follow up to ensure such conditions even after the emergency situation has subsided.

"Otherwise there is the risk that people are moved from one difficult situation to a life of misery in their own country," he said.

Follow-up measures include removal of land mines, educating youngsters born in camps to adapt to life outside, setting up micro-credit programs and settling property and land rights.

Greater political will and international cooperation are urgently needed, he said, or the solution will become the "warehousing of millions of people in camps in subhuman conditions, without a future."

New school year, new look at Holy Trinity

Parents, volunteers help renovate middle school

CHARLOTTE — Things are falling into place at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School. Classes have begun, clubs and sports are under way and phase two of the Campus-Wide Beautification Project is complete.

The project, which began last year, is an effort to show the excellence and beauty that are inside the school reflected on the outside. The project resulted from requests of students, parents and staff and was paid for by PTO fundraising and generous gifts.

Phase one involved a new fence and entrance sign in front of the campus, and was completed at the end of the last school year. Phase two — a number of smaller projects — was completed during the summer.

One noticeable change was the paint — students were greeted with a fresh coat of paint on lockers and hallways. Several murals also have been added. The cafeteria was redone to look like the beach with an ocean scene, lighthouse, surfboards and snack bar, complete with Winston the Bulldog Mascot at the helm.

The teachers' lounge, previously a dark room, was given a new coat of paint, new furniture and a new kitchen area.

The renovations, mostly done by parents and volunteers, have made a big impact already but are not over yet. Phase three is scheduled to begin soon and will include landscaping and a major library renovation.

"Our students let their lights shine every day in the way they conduct themselves, achieve academic success and serve our community," said Carole Breerwood, principal. "We owe it to them to make this school a shining tribute to them, to their teachers and to their families."

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

All saints and faithful departed

The Catholic calendar places back to back the celebrations of our saints and our departed brothers and sisters. We may speculate and come up with sophisticated theological reasons; however, I feel that the Scripture readings assigned to both events unfold the reasons of both celebrations.

On All Saints Day, Nov. 1, we read the State of the Union Address of Jesus Christ: the Beatitudes. On All Souls Day, Nov. 2, we read Lazarus' resurrection. It doesn't take a genius to understand that the resurrections in our lives take place only when the Gospel's Beatitudes become our Beatitudes.

Luke and Matthew have a different approach and a different version of the same message. Matthew places this sermon on the mountain. For Luke, mountains are for praying and plains are for preaching. Luke's version of the sermon is on level ground, where all kinds of people can hear it.

Both Matthew and Luke begin the sermon with eight pronouncements. In Matthew, all eight are blessed, but Luke again levels the field by making four of the pronouncements Beatitudes and four curses. Four hopes and four nopes.

Jesus is the classic prophet who comforts the afflicted and afflicts the comfortable. Future hopefulness and future hopelessness are both included. Dr. Luke the evangelist brings two elements of inclusiveness: the inclusiveness of the hearing brings the inclusiveness of healing.

While Matthew aims the sermon at the disciples, Luke points out that Jesus includes also Judeans, Galileans, Tyrites and Gidonians. The message of the kingdom is not for the Jewish people only.

Our saints can be defined as heroes and role models. I like the way a little girl described the saints while visiting a beautiful cathedral with her aunt. It was late afternoon and the sun's rays were streaming through a stained glass window that featured the figures of several saints.

The little girl pointed to one of the figures standing out in the strong light and asked, "Who is that?"

"That's St. Peter," the aunt replied.

Then pointing to another, the girl asked about another figure.

"That's St. John," was the reply.

With satisfaction, the little girl said, "Well, now I know what a saint is. A saint is somebody the light shines through."

The saints and our faithful departed were not perfect, but the light was shining through them, was it not?

Sins may hinder the transparency of the window or even break the window, so now is the time to clean the window or replace it, if necessary.

Someone has suggested that God created people because he loves stories: Here is one story illustrating our human condition. Two men called on a pious old monk to seek his advice.

"We acknowledge our sinful ways," they told him, "and we want to clear our consciences. Can you advise us on how to do this and get rid of our guilt?"

The old monk agreed to help. "But first," he said, "you will have to tell me about your sins."

The first man said, "I have committed a terrible sin, a grievous sin."

The second man said, "Oh, I have committed a number of small sins, none of them significant or terribly significant."

The holy man pondered the matter for a while, and then said, "Each of you must bring me a stone, representing each one of his wrongdoings."

The two men set out to carry out the monk's instructions. After a while, the first man staggered back, carrying with him a huge boulder. With a loud grunt he dropped it before the old man.

Then the second man returned carrying a bag of small pebbles, which he promptly laid at the monk's feet.

"Very good work," said the monk. "Now, each of you take your stones and put them back where you found them."

The first man staggered back to the place from which he had brought the huge boulder. But the second man was unable to remember where he had found each of his little pebbles. So he returned to the wise old man and told him that he couldn't carry out his instruction.

The monk replied, "You must realize, my son, that sins are like those stones. If a man commits a big sin, it lies heavily on his conscience. But if he truly repents, the burden is lifted. He is forgiven and the load is taken away."

"But if a man is constantly doing small things that are sinful, he is less likely to repent and more likely to remain a sinner, out of habit. Understand, therefore, that it is just as important to break the habit of committing little sins as it is to avoid a big sin."

The good news is that our Lord is totally accessible to you when it comes to the question of successful living. He offers you guidance, he offers you light. Humble acknowledgment of our absolute need for the light that comes in through the saints and faithful departed is living successfully and joyfully.

Let the light shine, let it shine!

Pope asks Catholics to spend time adoring Christ in Blessed Sacrament

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II asked Catholics to spend time during the coming year in adoration before Christ present in the Blessed Sacrament and offer praise to God for the gift of salvation.

At the end of his Oct. 13 general audience, held in a St. Peter's Square, the pope reminded visitors that he officially will begin the Year of the Eucharist Oct. 17.

He encouraged people to commit themselves, like the Blessed Virgin Mary, "to following Jesus, the way, the truth and the life."

"Be frequent adorers of the most holy Eucharist," he said.

In his main audience talk, the pope focused on the canticle of blessing found in St. Paul's Letter to the Ephesians and used each week in the church's evening prayer.

The canticle from Ephesians begins, "Blessed be the God and father of Our Lord Jesus, who has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavens."

The pope's text described the canticle as a "marvelous expression of the faith and, perhaps, of the liturgy of the church in apostolic times."

The verses offer a "grand icon of Christ, the heart of Christian spirituality and worship," but also the one who creates unity among all the creatures of the universe and gives meaning to human history, the pope wrote.

The passage emphasizes how people are called to be "holy and without blemish" in God's sight, a cleanliness that is not so much the ritual purity referred to in the Old Testament, but rather a purity in love, he wrote.

In Christ, the text said, "we are transfigured creatures," sons and daughters of God and brothers and sisters of all people.

Letters to Editor

Pro-life column delivers horrible truth

Regarding Editor Kevin Murray's pro-life column ("No discount for fallen angels," Oct. 1), I say "bravo" — what a great way to deliver the horrible truth about abortion to your readers.

Thank you for not dancing around the issue. It was delivered head on with no gloss, no apologies.

If more diocesan newspapers would deliver the true facts about abortion to their readers, maybe we as Catholics would be jolted out of our appalling state of complacency and use every means in our power, both as individuals and as a community, to stop the annual slaughter of over 1 million of our brothers and sisters.

Keep up the good work!

'Roe Effect' based on assumptions

In Cathy Cleaver Ruse's column ("The 'Roe Effect,'" Oct. 8), she said that those 40 million people who "would be among us today" (had they not been aborted) would be "very much like us." And that pro-lifers beget pro-lifers and pro-choicers beget pro-choicers.

Her entire article is based on these two totally unsubstantiated assumptions. I also find it interesting that if you use the Wirthlin Worldwide numbers, the difference between conservatives having abortions and liberals having abortions is 1 in 4 vs. 2 in 5. Not exactly a mile-wide gap there.

Perhaps the pro-choice movement is killing itself. But the pro-life movement, evidently, is not very far behind.

The double whammy

Longer lives equal additional responsibilities

It's 4 o'clock on a Wednesday afternoon; the sitter has just arrived. A bit limp from chasing my 3-year-old all day with a 20-pound baby in my arms, I scan my to-do list and feel weighted by its contents: articles half-written, book proposals in limbo, dogs needing annual checkups, groceries, laundry, bills. But I push all of that aside.

Instead I log onto the Internet and google the word "blepharospasm," an abnormal involuntary blinking or spasm of the eyelids. My mom has this rare disorder and in the last four months has become immune to treatments. That means she is legally blind, unable to do the routine activities most of us take for granted: drive, run errands, walk from point A to point B without assistance.

After a few good cries and vent sessions with close friends on how I'm not ready to become caretaker to one more person and how my mom is supposed to help me at this stage in my life, reality settles. I kiss goodbye the denial that my mom will see again and be able to baby-sit my two munchkins for a week, allowing my husband and me to enjoy a week in Barbados, or even a night out sometime.

Unfortunately, this, the double whammy, is one of the curses — along with bags under the eyes and around-the-clock exhaustion — that women endure when they start their families in their 30s and early 40s. As you age, so do your parents. So new moms, who traditionally had nana and papa to pitch in, end up doing double duty, especially since people are living longer these days.

According to Brian D. Carpenter, an assistant professor of psychology at Washington University in St. Louis, by 2050 more than 20 percent of Americans will be over age 65 and living longer, healthier lives than ever before. The inevitable assistance they will need will fall mostly on the shoulders of their adult children.

"This is the first time in history that American couples have had more parents than children," says Carpenter. "The average American woman can expect to spend 18 years caring for an older family member, compared to 17 for her children."

Mostly it's Mom that we're worried about because even though both men and women are living longer there still exists a gender gap, indicating that men are dying before women, leaving the latter to move in with the children or find assisted living until the ripe old age of 77 or 78, the average age of death for a woman.

So which adult child shoulders the brunt of caretaking responsibilities for Mom? The faithful daughter.

According to a 2002 study by the Family Caregiver Alliance, 28 percent of care to older adults is provided by daughters, 26 percent by other relatives, 24 percent by spouses and only 16 percent by sons.

In India, a mother is wished "many sons," because with daughters come expensive dowries. But in America Mom might statistically be better off with the other gender.

Our Mom, still young at 64, is blessed with four daughters: one to write the checks, one to run errands, one to cook and the other to write columns about all the things she should be doing but can't with two children of her own more than 500 miles away from her mom and sisters in Ohio.

How are relics classified?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Please explain what constitutes a first- or second-class relic? When did we start honoring relics? (Illinois)

A. "Classes" of relics traditionally are based on the closeness of their relationship to a particular saint. First-class relics are parts of the body, most often part of the bone. Second-class relics are items used during the saint's life, such as clothing. Third-class are objects that have touched a first-class relic.

Veneration of relics of the saints, especially of martyrs, goes back at least to the second Christian century. It was a way of honoring the saint and of asking his or her intercession before God in heaven.

Sale of relics is absolutely forbidden by the church, a rule which may seem odd and unnecessary to us but which was required because of abuses that grew through the centuries.

More than 1,000 years ago, possessing a major relic of a saint began to be a source of prestige for churches and monasteries. Buying, selling, even stealing bodies or parts of bodies of saints became common. Today, such transfer or "alienation" of major relics from one place to another without the pope's permission is forbidden.

Catholic regulations concerning relics are in the Code of Canon Law, No. 1090.

Roaring engines and the Lord's whisper

Sometimes we don't see God's signs

There is an old joke about a man who waits for instructions from God as a hurricane approaches his home. Neighbors tell him to leave, the sheriff comes to his door and does the same, but the man refuses because he has not yet heard from the Lord.

The storm comes and smashes his house and he dies. When the man arrives in heaven the first thing he asks God is, "Why didn't you send me a sign that the storm would kill me?"

"Are you kidding?" asks the Lord, "I sent your neighbors and the sheriff, but you wouldn't listen."

The joke came to mind as I read recent press accounts of Dale Earnhardt Jr., the swashbuckling superstar of NASCAR automobile racing. Junior, as he is always referred to, has legions of adoring fans, sponsorships that are worth millions and the legacy of his departed and nearly deified father, Dale Earnhardt Sr.

Junior was in a terrible accident at a racetrack in California in July and has only recently talked about it. During the accident, his car caught fire and the cockpit became an inferno with the temperature rising from 115 degrees to more than 750 degrees in a second and a half. That's hot. Fortunately, Junior escaped from the burning vehicle and suffered only some second-degree burns.

Catholics & the Media

But what is amazing about this accident is Junior's account of his escape from the car. He doesn't remember specific details but he has spoken about a feeling that someone rescued him. Videotape shows he got out of the car himself. By his own account, in an interview with CBS News, he said, "I swear somebody had me underneath my arms and was carrying me out of the car."

Junior clearly feels that some unseen force helped him get out of the burning wreckage. But who? Certainly the Lord is capable of such a miracle, but the media assumed his late father offered an unseen hand from beyond the grave. Again, in the CBS interview Junior says, "It freaks me out today just talking about it. It just gives me chills."

There is an assumption in the questions that Junior was rescued so that he might drive again. But surely another possibility exists. As with the man in the hurricane who can't seem to see the signs posted by God, it's fair to ask if Junior is missing something. Was he helped out of the car this one time or was an unseen hand leading him to a different life?

Most of us have heard stories of people who survive near-death experiences and radically change their lives as a result. For Junior, that doesn't appear to be the case — he immediately returned to the life of fast cars. In early October, he won the race at Talladega and celebrated by invoking his father's name.

We are each behind the wheel of our destiny, and discerning the direction of God's plan for us can be difficult unless we are willing to listen, through a life of prayer, to what God is trying to tell us. It is an interesting news story to hint that the late Dale Earnhardt Sr. hovers protectively above his son's racecar. It is a better news story to consider the possibility that the Lord's plan is in place at the racetrack, even if the driver may not be listening.

'Holy Smoke' tastes so good

Catholic churches supply food for fund-raiser

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

BRASSTOWN — The "sinful" potatoes (sinfully delicious, that is) were kept away from the "angel" eggs — until they got onto diners' plates, where they met a variety of other tasty treats during the fifth annual Holy Smoke.

Holy Smoke, held at the Brasstown Community Center Oct. 7, raised more than $1,700 to buy materials for HouseRaising Volunteers of Cherokee and Clay Counties, an organization similar to Habitat for Humanity.

More than 200 people chose samples from among the foods on the tables in a semicircle in the community center.

Some 20 churches and other Christian organizations provided such fare as deep-fried salmon, Mexican cornbread, Swedish meatballs, Chinese slaw, chicken and shrimp gumbo, and cheese grits. Father John Rice of the Episcopal Church of the Good Shepherd in Hayesville served up chili and rice, "a heavenly dish."

Notre Dame Sister Terry Martin, representing Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, provided the eight dozen "angel" eggs. Of course, as someone said, Sister Martin wouldn't bring "deviled" eggs.

Those eggs were right next to "the world's best cole slaw," made by parishioners at St. William Church in Murphy and served by Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

Also from St. William, Rev. Mr. Carl Hubbell presented ambrosia, Ted and Afra Wade offered spicy chicken wings and Susan and Flo Valentine served spaghetti salad and sauerkraut and kielbasa.

"Our people are involved in a lot of things," Father Kloster said. "They're very active in the community. The idea of providing housing is very basic to Catholic social teaching and this is done ecumenically. It bears a good witness to the community that the churches come together to do this every year."

Rev. Mr. Hubbell, HouseRaising Volunteers vice president, joined the organization after Sister Martin invited him to a board meeting.

His favorite part, he said, is "the day we give the key to the new owner. We have a special ceremony and a blessing. It's such a satisfying thing with all the churches (involved)."

HouseRaising Volunteers, started on its own 10 years ago, merged for a couple of years with the Hinton Rural Life Center, then split off again. It builds an average of two houses a year, one each in Cherokee and Clay counties. All labor is volunteer, except for a paid foreman.

HouseRaising Volunteers builds only for families with children. It takes seven weeks to five months to complete each house. The future homeowners are encouraged to help with construction.

"It's a program that works," said Edwin Manchester, HouseRaising Volunteers construction chair. "There are 60-plus children in good homes that weren't before."

St. William Church parishioners Rosie and Don Stillwagon have recently signed up to help build houses. They were recently in Homosassa Springs, Fla., to clear trees that Hurricane Francis downed in his mother's yard, but they hastened back to Murphy to prepare teriyaki stir-fry to serve at Holy Smoke.

"We heard a lot about (HouseRaising Volunteers) and we wanted to get more involved in the community," Rosie said.

"It's just wonderful to have people work together," Sister Martin said, "such a cooperative sharing of the churches."

Iraqi church bombings prompt Vatican concern for Christians' fate

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The bombing of five more churches in Baghdad, Iraq, has prompted new Vatican concern about the fate of Iraqi Christian communities.

The rudimentary but powerful bombs exploded within an hour and a half of each other beginning at 4 a.m. Oct. 16. No one was injured or killed, but heavy damage was reported to several of the churches.

At the Chaldean Church of St. Joseph, which was gutted by the bomb blast and a subsequent fire, Sunday Mass was celebrated Oct. 17 following an all-night cleanup effort.

Other churches that suffered damage were identified as the Latin-rite Church of Rome, the Orthodox churches of St. Jacob and St. George, and the Syrian Orthodox Church of St. Thomas.

Last August, car bombs at five Catholic churches killed 11 people and sparked an exodus of at least 10,000 Iraqi Christians into neighboring Syria and Jordan, church officials said.

Syrian Catholic Archbishop Basile Georges Casmoussa of Mosul, Iraq, expressed shock and sorrow at the news. One of the churches bombed in August was in Mosul.

The terrorist groups that carry out such attacks "hope that many, many more Christians will go," Archbishop Casmoussa said. "Their strategy is to create fear among the Christians and push them out of Iraq."

Following the latest bombings, the Vatican's missionary news agency, Fides, published what it called a "list of horrors," the names of 88 Iraqi Christians and the dates they were killed, almost all of them during the last nine months. The latest was a 14-year-old girl, a Chaldean Catholic, kidnapped by an Islamic group for ransom and killed "in cold blood" Oct. 14, it said.

Vatican officials have confirmed that acts of violence and intimidation against Iraqi Christians are increasing, as Muslim extremists consolidate their influence in Iraqi society.

Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel-Karim Delly of Baghdad said the recent church bombings were clearly designed to frighten Christians, but noted that the homes of many Iraqi Muslims were also being attacked. It is a problem shared by all those working for peace, he said.

Patriarch Delly said only prayer would stop these kinds of attacks.

"May the Lord touch the minds of these people, who do not love Iraq," he said.

Iraq has about 700,000 Christians in a population of more than 25 million.

Brochure details religious services available at U.S. airports

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Frequent fliers looking for a little religious respite have a new resource available to them to locate Catholic religious services at airports across the United States.

A brochure on "Catholic Civil Aviation Apostolate," published by the National Conference of Catholic Airport Chaplains, lists the airports where Catholic Mass is offered on Sundays, weekdays and holy days; where the sacraments of reconciliation and anointing of the sick are available; and which airports — with or without a chapel — have Catholic chaplains available for "a simple ministry of presence."

A map in the brochure depicts each of the 35 U.S. airports at which a chapel or chaplain are available. Most are in the eastern half of the United States.

"The availability of pastoral services in airports is a rather recent development," the brochure notes, adding that Cardinal Richard Cushing established the first airport chapel at Logan International Airport in Boston in 1950.

"Today over 100 airport chapels in 50 nations offer pastoral care," it adds.

Chaplains minister not only to passengers but to airport and airline personnel, families, visitors, the homeless and refugees, the brochure says.

The brochure was distributed to each of the U.S. bishops along with a letter encouraging its use from Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, episcopal liaison for civil aviation apostolates.

Editor's Note: Copies of the brochure are available from the U.S. bishops' Office of Human Mobility Apostolates by calling: (202) 541-3226.

Pope says preserving biodiversity is concrete way to fight hunger

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II said preserving biodiversity is a “concrete means for fighting the hunger and malnutrition of so many of our brothers and sisters.”

Marking the Oct. 16 celebration of World Food Day, the pope said ensuring that the world’s people have enough food and a nutritional diet requires that they have access to a variety of plants and animals.

The pope sent his message to Jacques Diouf, director of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, which sponsors World Food Day. The theme for the 2004 celebration was “Biodiversity for Food Security.”

In his message, released Oct. 15, Pope John Paul said governments must pay more attention to the needs and knowledge of farmers, particularly in indigenous communities, when setting farm policy.

“It appears there is a real risk of an abusive exploitation of their lands and the destruction of their traditional habitats,” as well as a serious ignorance of the fact that many of the poorest farmers have learned to survive precisely by ensuring they have a diversity of crops and livestock.

Marking World Food Day at the FAO headquarters in Rome Oct. 15, Diouf said biodiversity must be maintained in nature and on farms to ensure for all people sustainable access to enough diversified and nutritious food.

“FAO estimates that about three-quarters of the genetic diversity of agricultural crops has been lost over the last century. Just 12 crops and 14 animal species now provide most of the world’s food,” he said.

Pope says governments must do more to fight child abuse, exploitation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Governments must do more to fight the abuse and exploitation of children within their borders and beyond, Pope John Paul II said.

“No one can be silent or remain indifferent when innocent children suffer or are marginalized and wounded in their dignity as human persons,” the pope said Oct. 18 during a meeting with participants in an international conference of women legislators.

The Oct. 17-18 conference, sponsored by the Inter-Parliamentary Union, brought together about 200 female legislators from 107 countries to focus on efforts to protect children and adolescents.

Welcoming the legislators to the Vatican, Pope John Paul praised them for focusing their joint efforts on protecting the young.

“I encourage you to continue on this path in the awareness that children and adolescents are the future and hope of humanity,” he said.

“They are the most precious treasure of the human family, but at the same time, they are most fragile and vulnerable,” the pope said.

Conference participants discussed national policies and international efforts to reduce the trafficking of children, sexual abuse, sex tourism based on the exploitation of children, child labor and the use of child soldiers.

They also examined ways to promote children’s health and nutrition, to fight disease, to build strong families, to promote education and to increase the participation of children in sports.

“The immense cry of pain from children abandoned and violated in many parts of the world must spur public institutions, private associations and all people of good will to renew their awareness of the obligation we all have to protect, defend and educate these fragile creatures with respect and love,” the pope said.

A 150-member Russian army orchestra, choir and dance troupe performed for the 84-year-old pope Oct. 15 in the only official Vatican celebration of the pope’s anniversary. The pope has wanted to visit Russia, but has been unable to, due to tension with the Russian Orthodox Church.

THIS MONTH IN — 1992

Then-Bishop John F. Donoghue announced Oct. 21 that perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament would begin in mid-November at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. Bishop Donoghue said it was in response to many Catholics who had “inquired about having eucharistic adoration at one of our churches - a place where the Blessed Sacrament would be exposed and the faithful invited to spend silent time in prayer with our eucharistic Lord.” In January 2004, Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated the church’s expanded eucharistic adoration chapel, designed to accommodate growth of the devotion.

Catholic youths to serve on representative's advisory council

Students share opinions on politics, government

BELMONT — Three young parishioners of Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont will have added responsibilities this school year.

T.J. Stocker, Christopher Dean and Adam Herre are among the new students named to participate on the Youth Advisory Council to U.S. Rep. Sue Myrick, R-N.C., for the 2004-2005 school year.

The council is a group of high school students from different schools who have shown an interest in the functions of the legislative branch of government. Group members are selected based on a number of factors, including academic success, volunteer activities and extracurricular participation.

The council meets on a regular basis to talk and share their opinions with Myrick about current events, politics and government.

Stocker also serves as the junior teen representative to the pastoral council at Queen of the Apostles Church.

Actress shares abortion story at annual banquet

Catholic maternity home in Charlotte that offers pregnancy assistance for single, pregnant women and their babies, both born and unborn.

Approximately 1,000 people attended the banquet at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 14. Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who gave the invocation, was honored with the Msgr. William Wellein Award for Outstanding Service in part for the recent "Worthy to Receive the Lamb" statement addressing pro-abortion politicians receiving the Eucharist.

O'Neill, the 2003 recipient of the Proudly Pro-Life Award from the National Right to Life Committee and a spokeswoman for Silent No More, said Room at the Inn's work is "phenomenal."

"Last year, I did about 48 crisis pregnancy center fund-raisers and I'm thrilled to be here because (Room at the Inn) is a little bit different," she said during a pre-banquet interview. "We all have the heart for the child, but here there's great recognition for loving the mother. We don't want to separate the mother and the child."

O'Neill said, "Everybody's story about abortion is about as unique as their own DNA," including her own abortion, which she had at age 22 or 23 in the early 1970s after her then-fiance became upset upon learning she was pregnant. She already had one child at the time.

"Eighty percent of women who have abortions are coerced in some fashion, whether it's pressure from the parents or society, school or their age, financially or spiritually," she said.

"In my case, it wasn't that I couldn't afford to have the child," she said. "I was thrilled to be pregnant ... but despite my exuberance and excitement, the dad just flat out did not want the baby at all. I folded emotionally."

"And it happened at a time when abortion was just legal. It was before the advent of the ultrasound, before my faith in Christ," said O'Neill. "I didn't know

'When we finally realize that we're not designed to kill our children ... there is the hope and healing through Christ.'

God's authority on the issue. I didn't know how to respond to the fact that I was told the lie from the pit of hell — that I was just carrying a 'blob of tissue' or a 'cluster of cells' — so I suffered for many years with regret, shame. And that's not unusual for the 25 million women since Roe v. Wade."

She suffered nine miscarriages after her abortion.

"Not knowing Christ and feeling the shame, I felt that every miscarriage that I had was somehow payback — I wasn't allowed to have a baby because I had done that heinous act of abortion," she said. "That's not how God functions; God doesn't punish us that way. I've come to know that since I've come to know Christ and his grace and forgiveness, but I think a lot of women struggle with that."

"No matter how one comes to the conclusion of abortion in their minds — it's a quick fix, it's under duress — it sometimes sentences you to a lifelong dealing of guilt and shame," said O'Neill.

"The parents who took their teenage daughter to get an abortion thinking she needs a new start, an education or so forth, are not cognizant of the fact that they may be sentencing their daughter to higher percentages of cancer, depression, drug abuse and so on," she said.

And many fathers and extended families also suffer, said O'Neill.

"The walking wounded, the millions and millions of affected individuals, also need to be addressed," she said.

"Their feelings should not be squashed by Prozac or any kind of other drugs," said O'Neill. "When we finally realize that we're not designed to kill our children and that there is an aftermath that is devastating, as devastating as that is, there is the hope and healing through Christ."

Deacon Ben Wenning, Father Robert Conway and Father Tien Duong stand for the national anthem during Room at the Inn's banquet in Charlotte Oct. 14.

O'Neill said there is a story to be told about the "truth of abortion."

"Everyone needs to make an informed decision," she said. "Choice is not the issue; the issue is you have no choice if you have not the truth."

Eighty percent of women considering abortion change their minds when they have an ultrasound performed, said O'Neill.

"Those who get to see the humanity of their child in their womb don't believe it's a 'blob of tissue'. It's a baby," she said.

She also said there is an awareness of the truth spreading across America.

"Seventy percent of all teen-agers are pro-life ... the youth are turning around," she said. "My theory is that the teen-agers realize that if they had been conceived at an ill-conceived moment, for any reason whatsoever, they could have just been eliminated."

God makes no mistakes, she said, and women are beginning to realize that.

"As God says in his authority: You were not a mistake. I knew you before the creation of time. I knew you as I knit you together in your mother's womb," said O'Neill.

She commended those who work at and support Room at the Inn.

"Girls who are carrying unexpected pregnancies and have no place else to go find Room at the Inn," she said. "They find loving, Christian hearts; they find education; they find financial, spiritual, mental and physical support."

Since opening its doors in December

1994, Room at the Inn has served more than 300 women and their children. More than just a place to live, Room at the Inn offers women a Christ-centered rehabilitation program, based on education, personal responsibility and spiritual direction punctuated with mental health and adoption counseling services.

Transportation to medical and social appointments, work and school is provided, as is training in parenting, nutrition, budgeting, chastity and job skills.

Guests at Room at the Inn are allowed to stay up to 24 months, as long as they are working toward independent living.

"It's a place where they can go and they can feel loved and proud of their motherhood, whether they adopt out the baby or they raise that child," said O'Neill. "They see that there is a light at the end of the tunnel. They see that although they made some wrong decisions that arrived at an unexpected pregnancy, God makes no mistakes."

"We're all a work in progress," she said, and women who have had abortions need to know "there is help, hope, reconciliation, healing and forgiveness in Jesus Christ."

"God does not want us bound to our past, ruining our future even if we have eternal life, because the enemy loves that," she said. "The enemy would like to keep us under that umbrella of secrecy, shame and guilt."

"The truth will set you free," she said.

Little People of America, Inc., is a nonprofit organization that provides support and information to people of short stature and their families. For a class paper, Alex wrote this about his trip: "Julia and Dwight's parents are little too just like mine. We know that God makes everyone different. Some people are big and some little, some skinny, some fat. We are all the same inside! I sure had fun!"

The students drew their faces with fabric crayon and Barcafer ironed the drawings onto the material. The quilt is the third Barcafer has done in a year - last year's class drew leaves that she ironed onto a quilt, which still hangs on a classroom wall; Barcafer also made a quilt for a school fund-raiser, which sold for $2,500. "Although I have sewed, I had never made a quilt until last year," said Barcafer. "It is fun to do and the children enjoyed being a part of making the quilt."

Catholic student to have story published

Walker joins eight other IHM students to feature works

HIGH POINT — A student at Immaculate Heart of Mary School will soon have a story published.

A short story by seventh-grader Kara Walker has been selected for publication in the 2004 edition of the Anthology of Short Stories by Young Americans.

Walker's story "Do You Believe?" was selected by the publishers for the next edition of this book.

Now in its third year, the Anthology of Short Stories by Young Americans was created by Anthology of Poetry, Inc., in Asheboro in response to requests by teachers in almost every state to assist in the development of young writers, according to the organization's Web site.

Walker is the ninth student at Immaculate Heart of Mary School to have original work published.

As reported in previous issues of The Catholic News & Herald, seventh-grader Donna Ashley Elliot will also have a story published in the anthology. Seven other Immaculate Heart of Mary School students will have their poetry published in another publication, the 2004 edition of the Anthology of Poetry by Young Americans.

Cuban native joins national scholar society

CHARLOTTE — Claudia Flacon, a senior at Independence High School and parishioner of Our Lady of the Assumption Church, has been selected for membership in the National Society of High School Scholars.

The society invites only those students who have superior academic achievement and are among the top scholars in the nation.

Claudia, born in Havana, Cuba, won contests in mathematics, physics and others. As an active member of her church, she was selected to be a special guest during a Mass celebrated by Pope John Paul II in Cuba.

"When God gave me the opportunity to come to America, I decided to improve and be successful," she said.

For her academic achievements, Claudia was nominated to attend the National Young Leaders Conference in Washington, D.C. She is also a member of the National Honor Society, the National Technical Honor Society and Who's Who Among American High School Students.

Claudia volunteers at Carolinas Medical Center and is an altar server at Our Lady of the Assumption Church.

"I hope my efforts can make me reach my goals and make my dreams come true," she said.

Retreat revitalizes deacons, wives

Bishop Peter J. Jugis as the guest speaker, is designed to revitalize and strengthen the participants in their ministry.

"The deacon is the closest to what is happening at the altar," said Bishop Jugis. "Therefore, his spirituality, must be eucharistic ... the Eucharist is the center of the life of the church ... the center of our spiritual reflection."

"The most prominent place we meet Christ is at the center of the Catholic Church — the celebration of the Eucharist," said the bishop. "The parish must become a school of prayer where we have an intimate relationship with the Lord."

"Central to the ministry of deacons and the source of grace and sanctification are 1) the liturgy, by which (deacons) provide supplemental assistance to the bishop and the priests; 2) the proclamation of the Word, because the Book of Gospels is given to deacons in ordination; and 3) charity in the likeness of Christ whom he (the deacon) represents."

Much of the remaining sessions were devoted to clarification and questions about serving at Mass.

Bishop Jugis passed out two books: the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, which is part of the Sacramentary and spells out what is supposed to take place during the celebration of the Mass; and the "Instruction on the Eucharist" — both were published with the authority of the Vatican.

"If liturgy is not done well, every other ministry is going to limp along," said Bishop Jugis. "What we believe will affect how we approach the liturgy. Not only is the deacon to be the servant of the liturgy, the priest also has to be the servant of the liturgy."

"This weekend is a commentary of the deacons and their wives and their deep rooted spirituality," said Rev. Mr. Ron Sherwood, who is serving at St. Mark Church in Huntersville. "I was glad to have the privilege of the bishop's presence and instruction."

Deacon Sherwood, who recently moved into the diocese from Canton, Ohio, felt welcomed at the retreat.

"I met a lot of new friends and truly enjoyed the camaraderie," he said. "I am very thankful for this prayerful weekend experience and am looking forward to our next meeting."

the Lord," the bishop said. "I've seen that prayer is even more essential than in my parish ministry."

Bishop Jugis made many accomplishments during the past year — numerous confirmations, visits to parishes and schools, dedication Masses and two visits to Rome. But he is most proud of his ordination of four men to the priesthood.

"To give the gift of more priests to the (Catholic) Church is the greatest service I can give as bishop," he said. "These men will serve for the next 40 or 50 years and touch many people's lives."

Being selected as bishop of a growing and increasingly diverse diocese has proved to be a challenge to the young bishop, just 46 years old at his ordination Oct. 24, 2003. Bishop Jugis had to spend a significant amount of time becoming fully familiar with the extent of the clergy sex abuse crisis in the United States.

He also is responsible for presenting the Catholic Church's teaching on a range of topics, from abortion to the revised General Instruction of the Roman Missal. Included in his audience are members of the secular press, who don't necessarily have the benefit of a full understanding of the Catholic faith.

Recently, Bishop Jugis met with several members of the press and answered questions ranging from the ordination of women to his alleged shyness. He isn't shy, he said — but he does consider himself contemplative.

His popularity among his flock is evident at every public event he attends — from the warm smiles of his parishioners at Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe on the Sunday following the announcement of his election as the fourth bishop of Charlotte in August 2003, to the scores of people who lined up to greet him at the Room at the Inn in Charlotte banquet Oct. 14.

"Everywhere I go, people have been most encouraging of me and of my service as shepherd of the diocese," the bishop said. "People always tell me they are praying for me — I can feel the inner strength which comes from the grace of those prayers."

For the immediate future, he will continue to fulfill the promise he made at his episcopal ordination to visit each parish and school within the diocese. So far, he has called upon 52 parishes and 9 schools.

"I ask the people to please be patient with me," he said. "I am going to make it to each place."

Bishop Jugis has set as one of his top priorities to make welcome the multitudes of newcomers to the diocese, particularly immigrants from other nations.

The bishop also plans to focus on the Year of the Eucharist, which began Oct. 17, by participating in regional and diocesan celebrations.

Pope John Paul II has encouraged Catholics to commit themselves, "to following Jesus, the way, the truth and the life," and frequently adore the Eucharist during the next 12 months.

"As a priest, and now as bishop, I love meeting and serving the people," Bishop Jugis said. "I take them into my heart and pray for everyone."

New book: Vatican as corporate office park

REVIEWED BY GRAHAM G. YEARLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"All the Pope's Men: The Inside Story of How the Vatican Really Thinks" is the newest book by John L. Allen Jr., Vatican-beat reporter for the U.S. weekly National Catholic Reporter newspaper.

In the introduction, Allen states the central purpose of his book "is to bring the local church from which I come, and, more broadly, the English-speaking world, into more fruitful conversation with the center of the universal church in Rome."

He leads us through his "Vatican 101," a basic course exploring myths, psychology, sociology and theology and he dispels what he calls the top five myths about the Vatican:

— First, there is no monolithic "Vatican" with a single mind; instead, it is a diverse bureaucracy.

— Second, the question "Who's in charge?" assumes there is one person in charge of everything, which there isn't.

— Third, the place is not really ultrasecretive, though it is not really transparent either.

— Fourth, it is not really that rich. The Vatican, Allen says, "has an annual operating budget of $260 million." By contrast, "Harvard University has an annual operating budget of a little over $1.3 billion, which means it could run the equivalent of five Vatican's every year."

— Fifth, he says, "It is not true that ambition and careerism are the dominant psychological traits of the men and women in the Holy See."

"All the Pope's Men" has a long chapter on the Vatican and the U.S. sexual abuse crisis. It contains some of the best insights into this incendiary problem.

Allen says that Rome considered the revulsion to the revelations of sexual abuse another reflection of the Puritan strain in the American character that can't accept that priests are fallible humans like themselves. But, as Allen notes, our deeper outrage was with the bishops.

Allen argues that the source of misunderstanding was the Vatican's love of tradition (of not changing what seems to work) and the belief that bishops should stay in their positions in order to resolve the problems in their dioceses. In sharp contrast, Americans believe offending CEOs should relinquish their positions when corporate scandal breaks. Thus, Boston Catholics thought Cardinal Law should step down (and many thought he should be prosecuted as well).

Another problem was the Vatican's pace in dealing with the crisis. Americans may not like the rapid, ever-changing nature of our society, but we are accustomed to it. The Vatican views regional problems from a more global perspective and deliberately moves at a slower pace. Americans interpret that as indifference and stonewalling. To those who suffered at the hands of church predators, Allen's explanations will be cold comfort. Nonetheless, his contribution to the dialogue is important.

The final chapter on the Vatican and the war in Iraq is less compelling, largely because the pope and the diplomatic corps of the Vatican have maintained a firm and consistent opposition to our invasion and occupation of Iraq. They reject the idea of pre-emptive warfare as inconsistent with the "just-war" theory.

Allen's Vatican resembles a small and surprisingly well-managed company with the Holy Father as CEO. But most Catholics, I believe, see Rome as the heart of Christ's kingdom on earth. We are proud that our Holy Father can influence world events, that he writes exquisite prose, and that he has made more than 100 trips encompassing the globe.

But, more importantly, we see him as the supreme example of how to live a life in Christ. One photograph of John Paul II praying with his would-be assassin shows the character of this pope better than a dozen books giving us the insider's scoop.

Yearley writes on theater, literature and spirituality from Baltimore, where he studied theology at St. Mary's Seminary and University.

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: OCT. 31, 2004

Oct. 31, 31st Sunday in Ordinary Time

Cycle C Readings:

- 1) Wisdom 11:22 to 12:2
Psalm 145:1-2, 8-11, 13-14
- 2) 2 Thessalonians 1:11 to 2:2
- 3) Gospel: Luke 19:1-10

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Scriptures leading into this week's Gospel speak of God's love of his creation — of all that he has created, despising nothing that he has created.

What a fitting background to the story of Jesus and Zacchaeus, the tax collector. As we all know, tax collectors were despised in Jewish culture.

When his other efforts to catch a glimpse of Jesus over the heads or between the robes of the crowd fail, Zacchaeus finally climbs a tree.

The Lord spots Zacchaeus and tells him, "I mean to stay at your house today." Luke tells us that "everyone began to murmur. 'He has gone to a sinner's house as a guest.'"

Apparently Zacchaeus heard the murmuring and said to Jesus: "I give half my belongings, Lord, to the poor. If I have defrauded anyone in the least, I pay him back fourfold."

"Jesus said to him: 'Today salvation has come to this house, for this is what it means to be a son of Abraham. The Son of Man has come to search out and save what was lost.'"

Too often I find myself like the crowd, looking on the outside of people and assuming the worst about their behavior.

Sometimes I have found myself sharing some of these perceptions with a certain wise man who always has corrected me gently with observations about others who appeared to my eyes not to be redeemable. As a result of our conversations I've been humbled, brought to a realization that hope regarding others is the godly perspective, not condemnation. Gradually, I've gotten better about not jumping to conclusions about people. I'm still not perfect, but I have improved.

The wise man who has served as an example to me by speaking from the perspective of one who loves all God has created is our bishop.

Oh yes, and it should be noted that it was Zacchaeus' generosity toward the poor and justice in all his dealings that brought Jesus to praise him as a son of Abraham, not any of his religious practices or his lineage.

'Vera Drake' is devastating viewing

Superb acting, cast round out abortionist film

BY HARRY FORBES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — An outstanding performance by Imelda Staunton and an ensemble cast, a well-crafted screenplay and direction by Mike Leigh elevate this tale of an unsophisticated woman who, unbeknownst to her husband and children, leads a double life as she performs abortions on young women in difficult circumstances.

Leigh's "Vera Drake" tackles the difficult abortion theme with objectivity. His heroine is a cheery, lower-middle-class housewife (Staunton) in postwar Britain, circa 1950, with a loving garage-mechanic husband and two grown children who live at home.

The middle-aged Vera, who works as a domestic, is guileless and simple, and thinks a cup of tea is the solution to all the world's ills.

But there's another side to her that soon becomes apparent: She assists young women who are "in the family way" by performing illegal abortions.

She tells the girl that in a day or two she'll feel some stomach pain, should go to the bathroom to relieve herself, and "it will all be over." The audience is left to imagine the rest.

Vera takes no money, but simply sees herself as assisting these young girls who feel they have no other recourse.

We also see Susan (Sally Hawkins), a more affluent young woman and the daughter of one of Vera's employers, who is raped on a first date. Leigh does make a point of showing the callowness of many of these young men.

In contrast to Vera's clients, Susan goes to a regular doctor. But the relatively cold demeanor of the medical profession and the psychiatrist, who needs to know if there's insanity in her family before she can be certified for an abortion, stand in stark contrast to Vera's more human manner.

Eventually, the mother of one of the young ladies recognizes Vera. The daughter later becomes gravely ill, and the mother rushes her to the hospital, where the authorities insist on knowing how the girl's miscarriage was induced. The mother is bullied into revealing Vera's name.

In the film's most unbearably suspenseful moments, Vera's family is having a cozy celebration as the police close in. When they ask to speak to Vera, the family is flabbergasted about what the police possibly want with the quiet woman who leads such an exemplary life.

Staunton's heart-wrenching realization of what she's done, and the impact it will have on her family, is acting of the highest order. The camera stays on her face unflinchingly, and you feel every ounce of her pain.

Vera seems utterly incapable of thinking of what she's been doing as abortion; she's simply "helping girls out," she insists through her quiet tears.

'Shall We Dance?' Yes!

Jennifer Lopez and Richard Gere star in a scene from the movie "Shall We Dance?", a delightful remake of 1996 Japanese film, now set in Chicago, about a married lawyer (Gere) in a rut. His life is transformed when he secretly enrolls in a ballroom dancing school after observing a beautiful and sad woman (Lopez) looking out of the school's window. Wonderful feeling of uplift in terms of following one's dreams, and strong affirmation of family. A few instances of rough and crass language. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Leigh is careful not to make any of the authority figures villains.

Depressing as the subject matter is, the period atmosphere provides visual interest and there's always the joy of watching great acting. As this small, feisty, utterly ordinary woman, Staunton gives an indelible performance.

As for the abortion theme, the procedure isn't glorified in any way. The women involved are almost all desperate, and even though Vera's methods seem relatively benign, the women's fear and sorrow at what they are doing is achingly evident.

Leigh goes to pains not to make Vera a heroine. Nor, to my mind, does the film proselytize for abortion. The director leaves conclusions to the viewer, many of whom are likely to note that there is retribution on every level — personal and public — for Vera's well-intentioned, if misguided, actions. While the medical "establishment" is depicted as unfeeling and hard, even a "do-gooder" like Vera can put a woman at risk.

Leigh's script has all the subtle nuances of "real" people reacting to a domestic crisis. Vera's son, Sid, tells her what she did was "wrong" and "dirty." "Little babies," he says to her in disgust.

No matter how much you'll share Sid's critical feeling, "Vera Drake" is devastating viewing.

Interestingly, Leigh dedicates the film to his parents: a doctor and a midwife.

Because of the abortion theme and one sexual situation, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

Pope: Eucharist is needed 'light'

vites us to consider the eucharistic mystery, not just in itself, but in relation to the problems of our time."

The pope's message called the Eucharist the "mystery of light."

"This light is needed by the heart of man, made heavy by sin, often disoriented and weary, tested by suffering of every kind," the pope said.

"This light is needed by a world in its difficult search for a seemingly distant peace, at the beginning of a millennium that is distressed and humiliated by violence, terrorism and war," he said.

More than 65,000 people packed Guadalajara's Jalisco Stadium for the midday address. The congress gathered clergy and lay people from 87 countries for a full week of prayer and discussion aimed at bolstering devotion to the Eucharist worldwide.

One of those was Maria Modelewska, 60, who traveled alone to Guadalajara from Chicago to attend the congress after crediting the Eucharist with saving her from alcoholism.

"I was losing my faith and I was drinking, but I turned to devotion of the Eucharist and found strength," said Modelewska, who now regularly participates in all-night eucharistic devotion.

The pope asked the Christian community to seek a deeper understanding of the Eucharist during Mass and in moments of adoration. This understanding should give rise to a sense of communion and a sense of mission, as well as a greater commitment to fraternity and service to the weakest, he said.

The pope closed his speech with the phrase, "Stay with us, Lord. Stay with us."

The phrase is also the title of the pope's recent 31-page letter offering spiritual guidelines for the "Year of the Eucharist," which runs from Oct. 17 to Oct. 29, 2005, the end of a monthlong Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist.

"Stay With Us, Lord" urges local churches to promote respectful liturgies, adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and a better understanding of Christ's "real presence" in the Eucharist.

The Eucharist, the pope said, furnishes Christians with spiritual energy and a plan for living. It is the ideal way for the faithful to identify with Christ's message and his saving sacrifice, which should in turn have an impact on peace and justice issues in the wider society, he said.

"The lacerated image of this world, which has begun the new millennium with the specter of terrorism and the tragedy of war, calls on Christians more than ever to live the Eucharist as a great school of peace," he said.

This will help form men and women as architects of dialogue and communion, at every level of social and political life, he said.

The Eucharist should also bring Catholics closer to the world's poor because it manifests Christ's "extreme form of love" — one that replaced domination with service as the governing principle in human affairs, he said.

The pope urged local communities to adopt concrete expressions of solidarity and charity for the poor during the eucharistic year.

He told Catholics that the authenticity of eucharistic celebrations will be demonstrated largely by the love shown to others and by the care given to the needy.

The pope touched on points from his encyclical on the Eucharist last year, including the need to understand the Eucharist not simply as a shared meal or a symbol, but as a real encounter with Christ.

He urged obedience of liturgical norms, including those on reception of Communion, and suggested that every local parish use the eucharistic year to study in depth the church's rules on proper liturgy. The respect shown the Eucharist as the real presence of Christ should be evidenced in such things as tone of voice, gestures and moments of silence during the Mass or eucharistic adoration, he said.

The pope urged Christians to publicly witness the faith and the presence of God during the eucharistic year — for example, in eucharistic processions.

Partial-Birth Abortion

George W. Bush promoted and signed the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act into law.

John Kerry voted against the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act six times.

The partial-birth abortion procedure -- used from the fifth month on -- involves pulling a living baby feet-first out of the womb, except for the head, puncturing the skull, and suctioning out the brain. The great majority of partial-birth abortions are performed on healthy babies and healthy mothers, for entirely non-medical reasons.

Abortion on Demand

George W. Bush opposes the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion on demand, and he supports legal protection for unborn children.

John Kerry supports the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion on demand -- even as a method of birth control.

Record on Life

George W. Bush has repeatedly supported legislation which would protect unborn children and people with disabilities.

George W. Bush signed "Laci and Conner's Law," which recognizes unborn children as victims when they are killed or injured in violent federal crimes.

George W. Bush supported legislation to prevent minor daughters from being taken across state lines for secret abortions in order to avoid parental notice laws.

John Kerry, during his 20 years in the Senate, voted 79 times to support abortion.

John Kerry voted against notifying a parent before performing an abortion on a minor.

Supreme Court Appointments

George W. Bush stated that he will appoint Supreme Court justices who share his conservative philosophy and who will strictly interpret the Constitution according to its text. (The text of the Constitution contains no right to abortion).

John Kerry has stated that if elected president he would only appoint Supreme Court justices who support the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion on demand. He declared, "...I will support only pro-choice judges to the Supreme Court. Some may call this a litmus test..."

Abortion on Demand

Richard Burr co-sponsored the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act and has consistently voted against partial-birth abortion.

Richard Burr is opposed to abortion on demand and supports legal protection for unborn children.

Erskine Bowles supports the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion on demand -- even as a method of birth control.

Record on Life

Richard Burr has co-sponsored many pro-life bills in Congress, including a bill that would prevent minor daughters from being taken across state lines for secret abortions without parental notice or consent.

As President Clinton's Chief of Staff, Erskine Bowles lobbied Congress AGAINST legislation that would have prevented minor girls from being taken across state lines for secret abortions without parental notice or consent.

Erskine Bowles received $10,000 in campaign contributions from the pro-abortion group NARAL.

Supreme Court Appointments

Richard Burr will support President Bush's judicial nominees.

Erskine Bowles will not support justices for the Supreme Court who do not support a "right" to abortion.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Moral clarity in an election year

Every election year places added responsibilities and burdens upon us as faithful Catholic citizens. If we are to participate in the world, it is necessary to become acquainted with the pressing issues of the day as well as the candidates who are seeking public office.

We are encouraged by the Catholic Church to participate willingly, to the extent possible, in worldly affairs. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) teaches that "by reason of their special vocation it belongs to the laity to seek the kingdom of God by engaging in temporal affairs and directing them according to God's will..." (No. 898).

Likewise, the Church teaches that "submission to authority and co-responsibility for the common good make it morally obligatory to pay taxes, to exercise the right to vote, and to defend one's country..." (No. 2240). In other words, we have a privilege, right and obligation to express our faith by our participation in the electoral process.

As such, we will take a look at the complex issues to inform our consciences on Election Day. Indeed, our Catholic faith can provide us with guidance as we sift through the moral considerations of electing officials to public service. We could all benefit from a prayerful and reasonable consideration of the task that lies ahead in electing our representatives to office.

Before we evaluate issues, candidates and positions, we must first clarify the role of the conscience. Contrary to popular understanding, one's conscience cannot determine right and wrong. Many people today mistakenly think that "following their conscience" means they create the moral laws and rules by which to live, as if their conscience were akin to the legislative branch of government.

But the conscience cannot create law. On the contrary, the function of the conscience (built into our human nature by God) is merely to judge whether our particular actions are in conformity with the truth, whether our actions are in accord with God's law or natural law (No. 1776-1785). As such, the conscience resembles the judicial branch of government, rather than the legislative branch. It is only capable of applying already existing law, revealed by God or found in nature itself, to specific situations.

What criteria must we use to make our voting decisions? We are encouraged not to base a vote on a particular party affiliation or our earlier voting habits since many candidates, especially today, do not establish their agenda on traditional party positions and expectations. We are also encouraged not to base a vote on a particular candidate's appearance, personality or the opinion of the media.

And we are also encouraged not to vote for candidates who merely claim to be Catholic, since many politicians who claim to practice the Catholic faith reject basic Catholic moral teaching, which is, in fact, a great sign of a lack of a candidate's integrity.

We are encouraged, therefore, to base our vote on candidates who seek to promote political agenda that are in accord with God's revelation and natural law, especially concerning the human person. And so, particularly in an election year, we ought to pay specific attention to non-negotiable issues relating to the human person.

These issues are the most significant because they treat issues of life and death and the very stability of the family and society. They are non-negotiable because each of the issues concerns actions that are always morally wrong, morally illicit and must never be promoted by law.

Abortion

According to natural reason, abortion is always intrinsically evil and is never to be tolerated. This truth is also confirmed by divine revelation and, therefore, taught by the Church without compromise. In fact, the Church has consistently taught this truth ever since the first century and will never change her teaching on this evil practice (see CCC No. 2271).

The catechism states: "Human life must be respected and protected absolutely from the moment of conception. From the first moment of his existence, a human being must be recognized as having the rights of a person — among which is the inviolable right of every innocent being to life" (No. 2270).

And although our modern, secular society and culture uses euphemistic language to conceal the truth — such as the language of "women's rights," health of the mother, population control, the termination of pregnancy, "pro-choice," even the word "abortion" — the harsh truth is that those who promote such social and political programs are promoting the killing — the slaughter and holocaust — of thousands of innocent babies each day.

Each day more than 4,000 human beings — innocent children — are put to death legally by abortions. Imagine the loss of life greater than the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, 2001 — each day. That is the brutal reality that penetrates the society and culture in which we live.

As faithful Catholic citizens, we have a very serious obligation to speak out against this evil by not promoting and encouraging it with our vote. To be Catholic is to be pro-life; one cannot be pro-abortion and claim to be a Catholic in good standing.

Euthanasia

Closely related to abortion is euthanasia, which usually involves the direct killing of a handicapped, sick or dying person. Like abortion, euthanasia is always morally wrong, morally illicit and must never be promoted or made licit by law.

In the case of abortion, age does not determine personhood. Likewise, old age does not forfeit the rights and dignities afforded to human persons. Moreover, sickness, disease or other handicaps and impairments, including imminent death, do not render human beings non-persons.

It is never permissible to kill oneself (suicide) or assist in another's death (homicide) as in cases of euthanasia, but it is permissible to allow the effects of a disease or illness to run their course if the medical procedure or treatment is overly burdensome, dangerous, extraordinary or disproportionate to the expected outcome (Cf. CCC No. 2278).

As in the cases of abortion, there has been much confusion and euphemistic language employed to obscure the dehumanizing reality of euthanasia. Many who seek its justification and legal acceptance speak of euthanasia as an act of "compassion." However, this is nothing more than a diabolical reversal of the truth.

The word "compassion" comes from two Latin words meaning "to suffer with." Oftentimes the desire to commit an act of or comply with euthanasia comes from the refusal "to suffer with" the patient. Far from being an act of "compassion," euthanasia is an act that rejects compassion; it is an act that makes "suffering with" a loved one impossible.

Stem cells, cloning

Akin to abortion and euthanasia, embryonic stem-cell research redefines the human person in order to justify the murder of persons for scientific and medical advancements. The problem: extracting the embryonic stem cells from a living human embryo kills the embryo, thus murdering the human person. The solution: legitimate and highly effective procedures already exist for obtaining stem cells that do not require killing human beings.

It is well documented that stem cells from the bone marrow, placenta or umbilical cord of live births are already in use in treating leukemia and show promise for possible results in treating Parkinson's and other diseases.

In the same manner that the Church defends the dignity and legal rights of the human embryo, it also condemns human cloning: "Certain attempts to influence chromosomal or genetic inheritance are not therapeutic but are aimed at producing human beings selected according to sex or other predetermined qualities. Such manipulations are contrary to the personal dignity of the human being and his integrity and identity which are unique and unrepeatable" (CCC No. 2275).

Non-marital means of engendering human life change its generation from an act of procreation to one of reproduction, treating the child as if he or she were a product of a scientific experiment. In other words, in the generation of a child in the marital act, the child is "begotten, not made"; whereas in the case of human cloning, the child is made, produced, and not begotten.

Homosexual 'marriage'

Another evil threatening our society's stability is homosexual "marriage." While the Church does not condemn those struggling with homosexuality and, in fact, advocates that such persons "must be accepted with respect, compassion and sensitivity," nonetheless, the inclination towards persons of the same sex is "objectively disordered" (CCC No. 2358).

Further, the law of human nature, sacred Scripture and the constant tradition of the Church all affirm the truth that "homosexual acts are intrinsically disordered" (CCC No. 2357). Therefore, while the Church respects the dignity of persons, she also encourages them to turn away from sinful acts, live chastely and seek the freedom of Christian perfection as she encourages all who are bound by various spiritual or psychological disorders.

War, capital punishment

There may be a lingering question concerning two serious social issues that have not thus been considered: What about the issues of war and capital punishment? Since these both concern the protection of the common good, should they not also be treated among the previous list of non-negotiable moral evils? No.

While war and capital punishment are concerned about the protection of the common good, one of the principal duties of the state, they are not intrinsically evil, as in the case of abortion, and they both can be justified under certain criteria. The Church teaches that "as long as the danger of war persists... governments cannot be denied the right of lawful self-defense, once all peace efforts have failed" (#2308). "The evaluation of these conditions for moral legitimacy belongs to the prudential judgment of those who have responsibility for the common good" (No. 2309).

Therefore, the Church recognizes that elected officials in each state have the moral responsibility of protecting its citizens, without excluding the possibility of war as a legitimate means of defense.

Similarly, the Church recognizes and teaches that the state, the legitimate public authority, "has the right and the duty to inflict punishment proportionate to the gravity of the offense" (No. 2366). And "...the traditional teaching of the Church does not exclude recourse to the death penalty..." (No. 2367).

Therefore, in both war and capital punishment, the Church upholds the state's obligation and responsibility to protect the common good of its citizens. Neither is preferable. However, there is a fundamental difference between those acts that are intrinsically evil and never morally licit, such as abortion, and those acts that are justified under certain circumstances, such as capital punishment.

As faithful Catholic citizens, we have the opportunity and the obligation to elect to public office candidates who will ensure justice and social stability for all citizens, especially the most vulnerable and those unable to speak on their own behalf.

Alabama — sweet home for the Eucharist

Hidden shrine only a few states away

HANCEVILLE, Ala. — In this “Year of the Eucharist,” you can contemplate the meaning of the Blessed Sacrament anytime you are in its presence at Mass, or you can visit a shrine — a trip that could change your life.

When you think of the shrines of the Catholic faith, such as Fatima, Portugal or Lourdes, France come to mind. But to witness the awe-inspiring presence of God, you need not travel across the Atlantic but to Hanceville, Ala. — four hundred or so miles from Charlotte.

Hanceville, with a population of 2,900, is not an easy place to reach. The narrow, two-lane roads leading to the town twist through the foothills of northern Alabama. Once you arrive in town, you still have about 10 miles to go to the shrine and the roads actually get a little worse.

But what you find at the end of County Road 548 can only be described as incredible. The Shrine of the Most Blessed Sacrament at Our Lady of the Angels Monastery is beautifully situated on 395 acres of gently rolling hills.

The location of the shrine makes no practical sense. The monastery sits on what used to be a soybean farm in a region that is a stronghold for the Baptist faith. The buildings are architectural gems in a county that is known for its chicken houses. The appointments inside the church are on a scale that is suited to the Vatican, not rural Alabama. But there it is.

The monastery is operated by the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration. The driving force behind the construction that began in 1995 was Mother Mary Angelica, the Irondale, Ala., nun who started the Eternal World Television Network (EWTN).

Dirt under the fingernails

Outdoor work restores spirit within

Some time ago when I wasn't feeling myself, I took a walk to sort things out. Nothing was in balance. I was lightheaded, and my thoughts were running wild.

As I walked, a Benedictine motto came to me: “Ora et labora,” meaning that prayer and good hard work go together. I recalled my comradeship with Benedictines and how one old monk would tell his class every so often: “Enough of getting ideas into your head. Get out in the fields, and get some dirt under your fingernails.”

Remembering this, I stopped my current activities and began to work outside, cutting grass, pruning trees and pulling weeds. At the end of each day I was covered with dirt from head to foot. My arms and hands ached, and my golf game suffered terribly because of it. But my head cleared up, and my nerves recovered. I felt like a million dollars.

What is it in manual labor that so often constitutes wholesome therapy?

During a visit to South America, Mother Angelica received a vision from the Lord instructing her to build the shrine. According to a spokesperson, the necessary funds were donated by five families who requested anonymity and who stipulated that the costs of the shrine not be made public.

No expense seems to have been spared in the construction of the church that was built to resemble the Basilica of St. Francis of Assisi in Italy. A large plaza that can hold thousands of people sits in front of the church. Inside, marble from Italy and Yugoslavia was used on the floor, columns and altar.

A gold drape and intricate cedar wood work covered in gold leaf adorn the reredos that is the area behind the altar. The stained-glass windows are from Germany and the hand-carved cedar confessionals and pews are from Spain.

But the real opulence is reserved for the Blessed Sacrament, which is displayed high above the altar in an eight-and-a-half-foot-tall monstrance encrusted with diamonds, rubies and other precious stones. The effect of all of this, from the setting in the middle of nowhere, to the chanting of the nuns in perpetual adoration, is breathtaking awe.

Eugenie Breaux, the director of pilgrimages and spokesperson for the shrine, said many visitors have the same reaction.

“They find a peace here that they never imagined they could have,” said Breaux.

The presence of the Lord and the peace it brings is apparently what draws visitors to the shrine. Except for mentions on EWTN programming and word of mouth, the shrine does not advertise. No admission is charged, although donations are accepted.

“The Lord inspires people to give and we always have what we need,” said Breaux.

Although visitors are welcome, the shrine should not be mistaken for a tourist attraction. No pictures are allowed in the church. Shorts, miniskirts and sleeveless shirts are not permitted inside. The shrine does provide clothing for those who show up underdressed, which Breaux says happens often in the steamy summer months.

In a “if you build it they will come” leap of faith, Mother Angelica’s vision instructed her to build a facility that could hold 30,000 people. Currently, between 500 and 1,000 people visit the shrine each day. Breaux says the numbers are growing.

A strange location with little advertising, it seems that the Shrine of the Most Blessed Sacrament is defying all of the rules for a successful enterprise. Visit it one time and you will realize that none of that matters. Like the Eucharist it adores, the shrine is here forever.

Pope warns against risks of accumulating material riches

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II warned Catholics against the dangers of accumulating material riches and believing that wealth and power in life can somehow save one from death.

In a talk inspired by Psalm 49, the pope said that a man intent on gathering possessions risks becoming a “slave to avidity.”

Following an outdoor audience in St. Peter’s Square Oct. 20, the pope greeted pilgrims in several languages, although priests read translated summaries of the talk, by now a usual practice at the audiences.

The pope used strong words to condemn the quest for riches.

“The rich man, clinging to his immense fortune, is convinced that he can dominate even death, the way he has dominated everything and everybody with money,” he said.

But “a profound obtuseness seizes man when he becomes a slave to avidity,” he said in a departure from his prepared text. “Great wealth is not an advantage. Indeed, it can become a danger.”

The psalm invites people to reflect on “the malice of those who rush to accumulate material wealth,” the pope’s message said.

The psalmist, he said, uses financial terms to admonish that “no man can buy his own ransom or pay a price for his life.”

The first part of the psalm describes a just man who must face “evil days” because “my wicked ensnarers ring me round.” The pope emphasized the just man’s conclusion that man, “for all his splendor, if he have not prudence, resembles the beasts that perish.”

No matter how much a rich man is willing to pay to avoid death, he said, “his final destiny is inexorable.” He, “like all men and women, rich or poor, wise or foolish, must go to the tomb, just as other powerful men did, and will have to leave on this earth all that much-loved gold, all those idolized possessions,” he said.

It is a theme “explored by all the cultures and all the spiritualities,” the pope wrote, adding that Jesus concludes that even though one lives in abundance, “his life doesn’t depend on his possessions.”

At the conclusion of the audience, the pope lingered for more than 30 minutes to bless babies, newlyweds, clergy, religious groups and handicapped people in wheelchairs, with a sign of the cross or pressing of the hand for all.

clipper or exercising a broom. If we are weeding, we get down on our knees and literally grub in the dirt.

But there is more to outdoor work than exercise. Working on the lawn can touch off the artistic in us as we endeavor to make it beautiful. It takes a good eye to prune bushes. Most satisfying of all is to step back after this is done and admire the beauty of our work. And for the next few days we may well continue to experience a feeling of satisfaction each time we pass our work. If we have planted something, seeing it grows adds to the joy.

One last thing deserves a mention here: sweat. Not the sweat of anxiety, but the sweat of hard, physical work. This type of sweat is often at the root of true relaxation.

Ah yes, the Benedictines had it right: “Ora et labora.”

our senses, we are on our way to doing just that. We have accepted the fact that we are uptight; we’ve moved into action to correct the situation.

Most of the time when we’re uptight, we try to work through it while staying in the same situation — doing the same things. We don’t change locations or environments. Dropping everything and working with the soil is a resolute move, one that changes the “scenery” for us.

When we work outdoors, we also ventilate our system. So many of our buildings and homes are sealed. We live in recycled air. When we go outside, we often work in fresher air. I say “often” because polluted areas are not always that fresh.

Also, changing from formal to informal clothing is rather freeing. Why? Because it says to us that we are deliberately leaving our world of pressing concerns for awhile in order to become refreshed, renewed.

St. Peter Church in Charlotte stands as a testament to the faith and perseverance of North Carolina Catholics.

CHARLOTTE — St. Peter Church is not only one of the oldest Catholic churches in Charlotte, it is also one of the oldest churches of any denomination still standing in the city.

The growth of the Catholic Church in Charlotte can be traced to the early 19th century. Father Joseph Stokes, a missionary priest from Savannah, began visits to the area around 1824. Scarcely 100 Catholics lived between Hot Springs, N.C., and Columbia, S.C.

A more permanent Catholic presence began in 1851 when Father Jeremiah J. O'Connell was appointed to the mission territory. He laid the cornerstone of the first church building on March 25, 1851.

Built in what was then the extreme southern limit of the city, both the land and structure cost about $1,000. Much of the money was donated by non-Catholics impressed with Father O'Connell's preaching.

At the dedication of St. Peter Church in 1852, Bishop Ignatius Reynolds of Charleston spoke of the "zeal and piety of the few Catholics and the liberality of separated friends" in the building of the church.

After the Civil War, an explosion at a nearby munitions factory damaged the church's structure. Parishioners began raising money for a new church in 1869.

One of the benefactors, Dr. Dennis O'Donoghue, came to town to run the new weather bureau in 1878. One of the church's stained glass windows is dedicated to him.

In 1888, St. Mary's Seminary, a day and boarding school, was established on the church's property but discontinued operation in 1892 when Sacred Heart Academy in Belmont was founded. That same year, Benedictine monks from Belmont Abbey began their service to St. Peter Church. The cornerstone of the present church building was laid by Benedictine Bishop Leo Haid Sept. 3, 1893. Its gothic style, including tin-paneled ceiling, is representative of the late-Victorian architecture popular at the time.

One of the church's many benefactors was St. Katherine Drexel (1858-1955). The founder of an order of sisters whose mission was outreach to blacks made her gift contingent upon a promise to reserve church pews for those parishioners.

In 1906, the old parish house behind the church became the first Mercy Hospital with 25 beds, where it remained until 1915 when the hospital relocated to Vail Avenue. The present parish house was built in 1922 as a convent.

St. Patrick Cathedral began as a mission of St. Peter Church in the mid-1930s and was consecrated by then-

Bishop Eugene McGuinness of Raleigh in 1939. It was designated as the cathedral church for the newly formed Diocese of Charlotte by Pope Paul VI in 1972.

The Benedictine priests remained with St. Peter Church until 1960, when priests of the Raleigh, and later, the Charlotte dioceses assumed pastoral responsibilities.

In 1986, Jesuit priests of the Maryland Province assumed the pastorate of St. Peter Church, and they continue in that role to the present day.

St. Peter is a tithing parish with a strong commitment to the poor of the community. Parish programs include outreach work in El Salvador and Haiti, Social Justice committee, RAIN Teams, Room in the Inn, Loaves and Fishes, Uptown Urban Ministry and Habitat for Humanity.

The Garden of Eaten, which sells food prior to Carolina Panthers home football games, has raised more than $50,000 in five years to fund a variety of projects for the poor.

St. Peter Church was rededicated in 1989 after a renovation and restoration, and the completion of a fresco by N.C. artist Ben Long that graced the entire rear wall of the church. The triptych depicted the Agony in the Garden, the Resurrection and Pentecost.

On Feb. 20, 2002, for reasons that are still unknown, one third of the fresco fell, destroying the image of the resurrected Christ. The remaining portion was removed from the wall. Eighteen pieces were salvaged and mounted to concrete backboards. Eventually, they will be put on display in various parts of the church's campus.

Plans are currently underway to select an artist to create a new piece of artwork to grace the church. Jesuit Father Joseph Sobierajski, pastor, said they hope to have a decision made by April 2005. By October 2005, plans are to have the new artwork installed and a renovation of the church's interior complete.

With the completion of the Green Park adjacent to the church, the former parking lot is being transformed into a meditation garden with a columbarium.

A place of quiet beauty in the heart of bustling uptown Charlotte, St. Peter Church is an inviting refuge for prayer and meditation, as well as a source of outreach to many of the city's marginalized communities.

Bishops to consider liturgical texts for Hispanic Catholic rituals

BY AGOSTINO BONO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Because of the growing Hispanic Catholic population, the U.S. bishops will be asked at their upcoming fall meeting to approve Spanish-language liturgical texts that would formally incorporate important Latin American rituals into U.S. church services.

These include a blessing ceremony for the "quinceanera," a popular celebration among Hispanics that takes place when a girl is 15 to mark her passage from childhood to adolescence.

Also up for approval at the Nov. 15-18 bishops' general meeting are additions to the marriage rite incorporating traditions popular mostly in Mexico, Central America and Puerto Rico.

These marriage traditions include:

— The exchange of "arras," special coins symbolizing the couple's pledge to be good stewards in the new household.

— The placing of the "lazo," a double-looped rope or large rosary or garland, over the bride and groom symbolizing the unity of the marriage.

— The "velacion," in

Parish outreach helps farmworkers with everyday needs

KING FERRY, N.Y. (CNS) — The migrant camp in King Ferry has been a part of Eddy Celamy's life for the past 26 years. He stays at the camp each year when he and other migrant farmworkers come to harvest sweet corn for Turek Farms.

Like many farmworkers, Celamy, 49, moves from place to place following the harvests. The work is hard and the nature of his job makes it difficult for him to keep in touch with his family in Haiti, but he doesn't complain.

"It's not normal, but that's life," Celamy said. "I think if I was in Haiti, I'd be dead. I'm blessed. Over there, every day when you wake up you hear (that) many people died for nothing. I'm just working hard to eat, and I thank God I'm still alive."

Each year Celamy and his fellow farmworkers in King Ferry are the beneficiaries of the Migrant Farmworker Project, an annual service project of the Good Shepherd Catholic Community in southern Cayuga County.

Volunteers provide farmworkers with everyday items they lack, including clothing, and lead education sessions for them on such issues as health care. Each August they also hold a prayer service and a picnic to welcome the workers to the area.

The project began more than a decade ago, said its coordinator, Debbie Patrick.

Parishioners were looking for a way to become involved in mission work when they realized there was a migrant camp nearby, giving Catholics a way to do mission work practically in their own back yards.

"From that point on, we made an effort to serve them," Patrick said.

Patrick and other Good Shepherd parishioners began collecting nonperishable food, health and beauty supplies, used household items and clothing, which they then distributed to the farmworkers to help make their stay at the camp more comfortable.

The program has grown over the years, with parishes, businesses and organizations from Cayuga and two other counties becoming involved.

This year the program was expanded to include an educational component, which included an informational workshop designed to help the farmworkers make informed choices about over-the-counter medications.

The efforts of Patrick and other volunteers don't go unnoticed by the farmworkers, who include Haitians, African-Americans and Hispanics, as well as Caucasians from Appalachia. Celamy said he feels blessed to know that so many different people have come together to make life better for him.

Father Donald Curtiss, pastor of Good Shepherd, said the Migrant Farmworker Project helps the workers know that local residents appreciate what they do and helps the community at large become aware of their needs and their humanity.

"They're human beings like us. ... They still have that dignity," he said. "They're not just workers, they're husbands and wives. They work very hard outdoors and in the sun, in the weather, many hours a day."

Cardinal Schonborn stresses Eucharist's significance through child's story

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — Austrian Cardinal Cristoph Schonborn of Vienna played an indispensable role in editing the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," but in a New Orleans lecture he used a child's story rather than a lofty theological text to explain the mystery and power of the Eucharist.

In a world where people often rush through sacred moments, Catholics could learn a lot from Claire, a 4-year-old girl in the Vienna Archdiocese, Cardinal Schonborn said in his Oct. 8 talk on "The Church Living From the Eucharist" at Notre Dame Seminary.

"Claire is a little girl in a family of six children who prays every day personally for me," the cardinal told about 500 people at the Archbishop Schulte Auditorium.

"When her mother comes back from Communion, she sits down and Claire puts her head on her mother's breast and says, 'Mom, Jesus is now within you. I want to be close to him,'" said the cardinal. "Her mother said to the parish priest, 'I think Claire is ready for early Communion.'"

The cardinal noted that the parish priest asked Claire if she wanted Jesus to come to her in the Eucharist, and her response was: "No, Jesus wants to come to me."

Cardinal Schonborn, president of the Austrian bishops' conference, remarked with a smile, "Yes, Claire is ready to receive Communion."

The story illustrates the reverence all Catholics should have for the Eucharist, he said.

Vatican's social catechism touches on war, working women, environment

ROME (CNS) — The Vatican's "social catechism" includes an official, systematic explanation of how the Catholic Church applies Christian principles to social questions, including war, democracy, working women and the environment.

The "Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church," released Oct. 25 runs to almost 500 pages. Topics include ecology, the common good, human rights, family, work, women in society, the economy, the international community and indigenous peoples.

The book has three main sections: a presentation of the theological and anthropological underpinnings of the church's social teaching; an examination of basic themes and concrete social issues; and the pastoral and practical consequences of Catholic social teaching, especially for lay people and Catholics working in politics, business and the economy.

While the compendium supports the right of a nation to defend itself from attack, it also says a "preventive war, unleashed without evident proof that an act of aggression is about to be launched, raises serious moral and juridical questions."

The statement reflects questions and criticism raised by Pope John Paul II and Vatican officials over U.S. President George W. Bush's decision to invade Iraq.

Pope John Paul asked the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace to write the compendium, which frequently has been referred to as a catechism of Catholic social teaching.

In a 1999 meeting with council members, the pope said the "compendium or approved synthesis of church social doctrine" would help Catholics learn what the church teaches on social issues and see how important the teaching is.

Vatican's U.N. nuncio urges world to do more to help Africa

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Archbishop Celestino Migliore, Vatican nuncio to the United Nations, called Oct. 19 for the international community to increase its efforts on behalf of Africa.

He said the international community, and especially its more powerful members, had a duty "of redressing the economic imbalances that penalize Africa and of helping it to resolve its regional and national conflicts."

The reasons for such conflicts are found not only in the African countries and their factions, but also "beyond Africa and its interests," he said.

Speaking at U.N. headquarters in New York, Archbishop Migliore delivered his statement to a session of the General Assembly devoted to review of the New Partnership for Africa's Development, commonly known as NEPAD.

This is a program instituted by the African Union to express a commitment by African governments to take more responsibility for the development of their own societies.

Archbishop Migliore said that Africa was "doing more and more" in regard to preventing conflicts and building peace despite "the many adversities it faces."

He also commended the African peer-review mechanism, a self-monitoring process established to further the realization of goals of the New Partnership for Africa's Development.

Continuing the Vatican's long-standing campaign for canceling the debt of poor countries, the nuncio said it was regrettable that recent meetings of the International Monetary Fund, World Bank and group of industrialized countries known as the Group of Seven had "failed to agree on the total cancellation of debt of the 27 poorest countries."

The G-7 is made up of the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Japan, Italy and Canada.

"The realization of economic policies suitable for Africa, for the well-being of urban and rural families alike and for the preservation of African values is surely an urgent international obligation," Archbishop Migliore said.

He said much remained to be done to rebuild trust among the ethnic groups in the various African countries, but that "African solutions to African problems have started to emerge."

"The promotion of greater cooperation among religions in Africa could also be a decisive factor in peace-building and peacekeeping," he added.

ONE LAST KISS OF YOUR LIFETIME

"LAST KISS" by Rich Staley

"'Last Kiss' by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. 'Last Kiss' is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

RCIA Commission supports diocesan initiation efforts

Initiation benefits whole church, say members

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Church continues to grow in part due to the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, the process that initiates new members to full communion through the sacraments of initiation — baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist.

The RCIA in the Diocese of Charlotte would not be possible without the commitment and dedication of the diocesan RCIA Commission.

"What we do is provide resources and ongoing formation to parish ministers serving in the RCIA," said Linda Licata, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro and commission chairperson.

"We also plan and oversee the diocesan rites of election, which were not offered on the diocesan level until the commission was formed (in 1997)," she said.

"We're a support system," said Capuchin Franciscan Father Martin Schratz, parochial vicar at St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte and commission member.

"We're there as support for the diocese to any parishes who need us," said Father Schratz. "We help people in the parishes grow in the process, to help them understand what the process is, as well as assist the bishop and priests."

"Our job is to expose as much information as possible," he added.

The seven-member RCIA Commission held three in-service sessions for parish delegates in the winter of 2003 to prepare for the various rites of election at churches throughout the diocese this April. Planning has already begun for 2005.

The commission members are not paid; they receive no reimbursements for their work or travels, said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of the diocesan faith formation office.

"Each of the commission members has a passion for initiation ministry and for the liturgy," said Licata. "It's our passion and love of the church that helps us to do this work, and not see it as work but as a ministry."

Both Licata and Father Schratz were among the first to join the commission at its inception. Licata, who has been involved with formation ministry for almost 25 years, is a team member for the North American Forum of the Catechumenate, which started as a grassroots organization in 1987 for persons interested in learning about the initiation process.

"I've been involved with the RCIA since 1986," said Father Schratz. "It's a joy sharing the faith with people and watching their faith grow."

The RCIA is important, he said, because many people today are searching for answers.

"If the RCIA is done properly, we can share the gift of our faith and pass it on," said Father Schratz, who believes in emphasizing the "faith experience" as well as academics in the RCIA.

"It's our passion and love of the church that helps us to do this work, and not see it as work but as a ministry."

"If it's done as a community, you can see, witness and explore what the faith is all about," he said. "The process gives them a rock-solid foundation, upon which you can build the other elements of the Catholic faith."

Commission members are excited about their third RCIA focus workshop for this year, "The Period of Purification and Enlightenment," featuring Steven Janco, director of liturgy and music at a parish in the Diocese of Illinois and a member of the North American Forum on the Catechumenate.

"We have explored the period of inquiry and the period of the catechumenate," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of the diocesan faith formation office. "Now it is time to explore the period of purification and enlightenment."

The workshop will explore how to incorporate the RCIA into the liturgical process of the Easter Triduum.

"It will be beneficial for priests, deacons and musicians as well as parish team members to attend ... to see where their role is ... what they can do in their parishes to make it work," said Father Schratz. "It's the entire parish's responsibility to be involved (in the RCIA)."

"The foundation of the rite is evangelization. It's not just the work of RCIA ministers but our work as a church," said Licata.

"The rite is not just to make new Catholics but to form disciples," she said. "It forms new Catholics and all of us as we walk with them on their journey to God. It has the power to transform the church — how we're called to live out our mission in the church."

Two American Catholics look back on their faith lives

REVIEWED BY OWEN PHELPS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It is hard to imagine how two personal reflections on Catholicism could be more different than "Called to Question: A Spiritual Memoir" by Benedictine Sister Joan Chittister of Erie, Pa., and "A Faith for Grown-Ups: A Midlife Conversation About What Really Matters" by Pittsburgh's diocesan communications director, Robert P. Lockwood.

One thing they have in common is insight about being a mature Catholic in 21st-century America.

Their differences are profound. There is almost nothing similar about their backgrounds, their focus, their concerns or their intended audiences.

Both vividly reflect on their Catholic upbringings. But Lockwood's was a happy time loaded with friendships. Sister Joan describes a tormented, solitary childhood that she struggled to transcend. Sister Joan's book is an inner journey of the soul. Lockwood reaches out to others.

Sister Joan's fans — and they are legion as she is a widely published author and well-known speaker — will enjoy sharing her personal faith journey, from her earliest days to her recent years as one of America's most prominent women religious.

The chapters are organized into seven sections ranging from the "inward life" to issues of resistance and ecology.

Occasionally one finds insight, as when she describes why thinkers chafe at commands: "Orders bind us to an immediate response, but listening sets us free to think things through." But she paints the nuanced world she inhabits with a broad brush, not always concerned about staying within the lines.

"Every era manufactures a heresy proper to the times. Quietism is ours," she writes. Really?

On page 223, I scribbled: "I think Joan and I are on the same page spiritually, but she carries some baggage that does not burden me — and much anger." On page 224 she acknowledges the burden of "old baggage." She says one needs to "grow beyond the wounds and memories," but in the end it is not clear that she does.

Lockwood's book is different because it is not his purpose to come to grips with his past. He goes back in time to establish common ground with his intended reader — the baby boomer who drifted away from the faith because of a slight, a grudge or just the momentum of growing up in a post-Christian culture.

Lockwood himself drifted away with the flow of college life, but his drift was short-lived. After soon found a place in the Catholic press and worked his way to the posts of president and publisher of Our Sunday Visitor Publishing. While he was there, we met and became friends.

Lockwood is familiar with all the baggage, misinformation and misunderstanding that have kept many of his cradle-Catholic contemporaries from the practice of their faith. He seeks to have a respectful "conversation" with them.

His message is one of liberation: Forget the trappings of childhood that bother, befuddle and burden you; focus instead on the core of Catholicism and enjoy a richer, more satisfying life. He knows the core and writes about it with clarity.

His book does something I would like to do — and sometimes try to do — with old friends and other contemporaries who have lost their way or feel adrift, looking for an anchor as life recedes.

Lockwood writes that he likes the often-quoted description of the Catholic Church as "Here comes everybody." That description is still good news for Catholics, even if some don't like to hear it and others don't believe it.

And it helps explain how such different authors — and their books — are Catholic.

Phelps is director of communications for the Diocese of Rockford, Ill., and associate publisher of The Observer, Rockford diocesan newspaper.

God invites us to rise, shine

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When I was a child, I had an upstairs bedroom from which I would hear the morning clarion call of my mother waking me up for school.

Usually her greeting would begin with a cheerful, "Rise and shine!" But if I tried to sneak in a few more minutes of sleep, a note of exasperation would creep into her voice. On those rare occasions when I heard footsteps marching up the stairs, I knew it was time to get up — and fast!

My husband's childhood memory is similar, except that his mother appended the morning greeting with, "Rise and shine — it's daylight in the swamps!"

It wasn't until recently that I was struck by the notion that the invitation was not only to get up out of the bed, but to "shine."

This week's Scriptures begin with the story of the martyrdom of seven brothers, all of whom trusted in the power of God to raise them up and restore them to life. This passage reflects the belief of many Jews in the last two centuries before Jesus' birth that physical death was not the end, but that somehow God, as the author of life, could and would restore the living.

In the Gospel, Jesus refutes the Sadducees — those Jews who did not believe in a resurrection — by telling them that the belief in an afterlife was not a recent notion, since Moses himself had professed it. Jesus emphatically states that God is the God of the living; thus a child of God is one who by his or her very nature is filled with life.

The message is meant to assure the believer of the promise of deliverance from death and the existence of an afterlife.

But the "God of the living" is not merely a rescuer at the hour of death; God is a here-and-now source of life in all its fullness. To be a follower of Jesus, to claim status as a child of God, one embraces the gift of life in all its myriad manifestations, whether in oneself or in another.

This promised life invites us to wake from our sleep of complacency — not only to rise, but to shine with the very vitality of God.

Questions:

What does the statement "God is the God of the living" mean to you? In what way are you being resistant to the fullness of God's life shining through you?

presence of so many anniversary couples who are celebrating Christ's abiding love in their marriage," said Bishop Jugis during his homily.

"It is in a spirit of joy and gratitude to Almighty God that you come to this Mass in this special marriage anniversary year for each of you," he said. "Each year has been a gift from God, and now in 2004 you have reached a special milestone by God's grace."

The bishop said the anniversary couples have endured to this day not only because of their love for each other but also for their love of Jesus.

"It is your union with him which has guaranteed the presence of his grace in your marriage," said Bishop Jugis.

"If there is no union with Christ, no love for Christ, then his grace cannot work effectively," he said. "But marriage produces the fruit of holiness, of charity, of peace, because of your abiding union with Christ."

"This is the key — in good times and in bad, in sickness and in health, as the marriage vows state: your abiding union with Christ," said the bishop.

"Marriage is not always easy, but the couples' commitments to one another and to God has helped them endure," said Gerard Carter, director of the diocesan Family Life Office, which organizes the celebration.

"Of all the things that come with life, these couples symbolize what it means to be committed despite the complexities," he said.

"It sets a precedent for other couples to see this is sacred," said Marie Aceti. "On our wedding day, we dedicated our lives to Jesus."

"The love of Christ perfects your love," the bishop told the couples. "Christ's love teaches us to be patient with each other, to be understanding, to be compassionate to each other, to be merciful, to be forgiving of the other's faults; in short, to know the perfection of love."

"The joining of a man and woman in matrimony gives the couple life and meaning that would not exist without their joining," said Dominic Esposito, who celebrated 50 years with his wife, Julia. They are parishioners of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory.

Bishop Jugis spoke of the many "blemishes" that have disfigured the beauty of marriage over the years, such as polygamy, divorce, selfishness, hedonism and unlawful contraceptive practices.

Anniversary couples renew their wedding vows during the annual diocesan wedding anniversary Mass at St. Gabriel Church Oct. 24.

"...But today we must add another situation which devalues and further weakens marriage — the trend toward making same-sex unions the legal equivalent of marriage," said Bishop Jugis.

"Whenever our contemporary society takes hold of marriage, it ends up making marriage something very different from what God intended it to be — something very different from the beautiful sacrament we are honoring today at this Mass," he said.

Father Edward Sheridan, pastor of St. Gabriel Church, and Father Robert Conway, parochial vicar, concelebrated the Mass, with Deacon Ben Wenning assisting. Bishop Jugis also celebrated his own anniversary — the day marked the one-year anniversary of his ordination as bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The bishop really is a holy man," said Tony Aceti. "He radiates holiness."

After the bishop's homily, the couples stood, faced each other and renewed their marriage vows. Their promises were then sealed with a kiss.

"It was moving to repeat our vows — very special and touching," said Marie Aceti.

"Marriage is a sacrament, a covenant, a vocation, a way of salvation," said Bishop Jugis. "You are the living signs that marriage and family life are alive and well."

"I thank you for the privilege of sharing in your love and joy today," he said.

Well-being for seniors

Reflection at St. Mark Church in Huntersville Oct. 21.

Sister Kienast, pastoral associate at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, was the keynote speaker for the event, which brought seniors from 11 parishes together to explore and challenge their faith. Diocesan Catholic Social Services Elder Ministry sponsored the annual event, which also held at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Oct. 28.

Sister Kienast compared the hearth — historically the centerpiece of the home, providing warmth and light — to a person's heart, providing hospitality, compassion and sensitivity.

"Does growing older mean growing colder?" she asked. "Is there room in our hearts for all those seeking understanding and caring?"

"Our church needs our heart, our warmth, our wisdom," Sister Kienast said, urging her audience not to ignore the suffering of others.

She also told those gathered not to squander the wisdom they have gained over the years by thinking their "time has past" or they have given enough.

"How can any Catholic look up at the crucifix and say 'I've done enough — I've given enough?'" she asked. "When you stop giving, you stop living."

Sister Kienast called those gathered at the Fall Day of Reflection part of "the greatest Catholic generation."

"I believe those Catholics who reached adulthood in the 1950s and '60s brought about the strength in the church," she said.

According to Sister Kienast, the "we can do it" attitude of post-World War II Catholics fueled the success of Catholicism in the '50s and '60s, including the construction of more Catholic schools than ever before and the spread of Catholicism in the South.

"Sister Jeanne Marie helped to inspire, focus and empower our Catholic seniors," said Sandra Breakfield, director of diocesan Elder Ministry. "It was an incredible day."

"Because (the event) brings seniors together from different parishes, it allows them to interact and helps them feel part of the larger Catholic Church," said Sister Kienast.

Elder Ministry provides guidance to parishes within the Diocese of Charlotte in order to enhance the well-being of older adults. Each year, Elder Ministry serves more than 600 senior Catholics in the diocese through events such as the Spring Fling, Fall Day of Reflection and Health and Safety Fair, Breakfield said.

The Fall Day of Reflection was one of two events sponsored by Elder Ministry held in Mecklenburg County last week.

A Health and Safety Fair, co-sponsored by the Mecklenburg Area Task Force on Aging, was held at St. Ann Church Oct. 19. The fair showcased a variety of senior living options, scam prevention techniques and health screenings for blood pressure, blood sugar, osteoporosis and spinal analysis.

"Each year, with the help of many hard-working volunteers, Elder Ministry provides programs that enrich the physical, psychological and spiritual well-being of senior adults throughout the Diocese of Charlotte," said Breakfield.

Hispanic rituals considered

which a large veil or shawl is placed completely over the bride and over the shoulders of the groom to symbolize that the bride is the center of the new home the couple is about to establish.

Currently, these rituals are used by Hispanics in U.S. liturgical services but without standardized texts. Spanish-language texts are often borrowed from Latin American countries where these rituals are officially incorporated into liturgical services.

Including these Hispanic traditions in the U.S. liturgy is an acknowledgment by the bishops of what is already happening in the Hispanic Catholic community, said Father Juan Sosa, president of the National Hispanic Institute for the Liturgy.

"The bishops of the United States are filling the virtual needs of people who want to express their traditions that have come down from the centuries," said Father Sosa, a member of the bishops' subcommittee on Hispanic liturgy, which helped draft the Spanish texts.

These traditions symbolize important Christian concepts, he added.

"The 'arras' symbolize an exchanging of equality between the spouses in household stewardship. It is the first offering of the newlywed couple to God," he said.

The "lazo" and the "velacion" symbolize the "binding together of what God has joined," he said.

At the November meeting, the bishops will also be asked to approve Spanish-language texts for infant baptisms.

The texts scheduled to be voted on are part of a long-term project by the bishops to translate into Spanish all the English-language liturgical books approved for use in the United States.

The project involves bilingual editions of the books with Spanish on one side of the page and English on the other.

The purpose of bilingual editions is to facilitate their use by English-speaking priests who have a limited command of Spanish and Spanish-speaking priests who have a limited use of English, said Chicago Cardinal Francis E. George in an explanatory note to the bishops that accompanies the document on the liturgical texts. The cardinal is chairman of the U.S. bishops' liturgy committee, which is supervising the translations.

Father Sosa said that the bilingual books also would make it easier to perform bilingual services in increasingly multicultural U.S. parishes.

"The inclusion in bilingual form in the official books of the church will give importance to the rituals that the Hispanic Catholics have brought with them to the United States," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The values that are contained in the rituals are wonderful values for other cultures as well as for the Hispanic communities," she said.

Finally able to laugh

Reflecting on wedding-day mishaps

My husband Andre and I observed our 16th wedding anniversary in October. For the first time in years, I can laugh at things that went terribly wrong during our wedding despite meticulous planning.

Like clockwork we'd met all requirements, cross-checking 200 guests' addresses. I preferred only one bridesmaid, my best friend Elmira Thornton. Andre's buddy Phillip Dean Adams was his best man. We rested easy with Jesuit Father Glenn Murray and Marjorie Gabriel-Burrow, major contributors to the black Catholic hymnal "Lead Me, Guide Me," as coordinators of our 7 p.m. nuptial.

Then a rift appeared in my seamless tapestry.

During the final proofing of our invitation, I did not catch that I had listed "H" and not "L" for the middle initial in the name of our wedding's principal celebrant — Bishop Joseph Lawson Howze of Biloxi, Miss.

The limousine driver chose our wedding day to shampoo the car's burgundy velour interior, something I did not discover until I emerged in a damp wedding gown.

The photographer, whose service was a gift, arrived late, left early and did not take one photo of our wedding party.

The best man arrived without the groom, saying warily: "Carole, I waited for Andre as long as I could, as long as I dared. I've brought his tux with me."

And where was the happy groom? Waiting at a barbershop to get his hair cut. When he arrived an hour late, he was directed to the convent where an elderly Franciscan nun had his tux and was praying for his imminent arrival.

Once inside the church, Andre ran toward me and fell on his knees, asking for forgiveness. When my friend Beverly McFarland overheard that he didn't have the ring, she snatched her own diamond off her finger and gave it to him.

Andre was to walk down the aisle first, flanked by his father and mother. Then I was to process with my parents.

The music began.

Nervous and not realizing that his father was there from Virginia, Andre took off down the aisle on the arm of only his mother, an attractive, youthful-looking woman whose pale-silver gown made some of my out-of-town friends who'd never met Andre think they were at the wrong wedding.

When my parents and I processed down the aisle, breathing freely at last, my breath caught as I saw my local auxiliary, Josephite Bishop John Ricard, seated in the sanctuary with Bishop Howze. In an instant I realized that I had breached an unspoken protocol by not informing him that Bishop Howze would be in Baltimore officiating. Sheepishly I grinned at him, honored nonetheless that he would concelebrate.

It was Marist Brother Cyprian Lamar Rowe's reflection on the true meaning of love, tough at times, that helped us all to loosen up.

I still recall what Bud Schutzman, Andre's friend and former employer, said to me when we danced at the reception: "Smile, honey, and enjoy this moment. They'll never come together again for you like this until your funeral." He urged me to embrace all the good that's in the present moment, and not to linger over all that should have been.

Before returning my friend's ring, I said half jokingly, half seriously to Bishop Howze, "When I get my wedding rings, I'll have to mail them to you because I want YOUR blessing on them!"

He smiled indulgently, betraying a skill born of years of dealing with us sheep and our dilemmas.

"Oh, there's no need to do that," he replied. "The blessing stays with the finger!"

Put parish picnics on the agenda, please

As you probably have read already, the U.S. Catholic bishops are holding their fall national meeting in mid-November. To our chagrin here at the Roadkill Theological Roundtable, they have not included an agenda item we advocated: a pastoral letter on parish picnics.

I know you are as disappointed as we.

"Maybe they just didn't think parish picnics constituted a serious topic," ventured my friend Bud last Sunday over RTR coffee and donuts.

"Then they've never experienced tainted potato salad," snapped his wife, Marlene.

"Or ripped a tendon in a three-legged race," I added.

"Or been called out at home on what was clearly a wrong call," noted Msgr. O'Kneel as he passed our table.

We at RTR are resilient, though.

We have faced similar disappointments in the past from the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. To date they have not addressed other proposed agenda items: a national mascot; abstaining from television on Fridays; buying a major sports fran-

Pope thanks missionaries, pays homage to those killed while working

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: Due to an early publishing schedule, we are unable to bring you the story from the pope's weekly audience on Wednesday.

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II thanked missionaries at work all over the world and paid special homage to those who have died while performing their work of evangelization.

In his Angelus address Oct. 24, the pope offered his "very cordial greeting and profound thanks" to the many missionaries gathered in St. Peter's Square as well as to those carrying out the difficult and often dangerous task "on the frontiers of evangelization."

He promised them all "a special remembrance in prayer."

The pope gave his greeting following a Mass marking World Mission Sunday. He did not celebrate the Mass.

Speaking from the window of his apartment to the crowd gathered below, the pope said he gave particular thought to "those who crowned their witness to Christ and service to man with the sacrifice of their lives."

He reminded the faithful to "renew their own responsibility in the word of the Gospel to all people."

The Vatican says that approximately 30 missionaries lose their lives every year, but that tens of thousands of Christians die annually because of their faith, the Italian missionary news agency, Asianews, reported.

Cardinal Crescenzo Sepe, prefect of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, told Vatican Radio in an Oct. 23 interview that there are about 75,000 Catholic missionaries around the world "who leave their country, their land, their families, their language and their culture and offer themselves to their brothers to announce Christ."

Statistics issued by Fides, the news agency of the congregation, show that out of a world population of 6 billion people 1 billion are Catholic. The number of Catholics decreased slightly on every continent except Asia.

The number of lay missionaries, Fides reported, increased on every continent except Europe.

Cardinal Sepe reminded Catholics that "every baptized person is essentially a missionary" and should "give witness to their faith in their own environment."

However: a) Washington, D.C., is really chilly in November; b) we'd probably be overwhelmed by the same-sex marriage and/or optional celibacy people; and c) the NFL season is in full swing.

The bishops are, however, going to vote on the text for an adult national catechism for U.S. Catholics, and we can hope a future edition might include a footnote on parish picnics.

They are electing new officers. Maybe one of the candidates will include parish picnics in his platform.

Not to dream too much, but they might also commission a pastoral letter on marriage, and what kind of pastoral would that be if it did not mention the role of the parish in strengthening marriage and the role of picnics in fostering strong parishes. Right?

The bishops might even talk about joining Christian Churches Together, an offspring of the National Council of Churches. There would be nothing like a picnic to nurture ecumenical relations, as long as it was clear who was in charge of cleanup.

chise; developing a theology of parish garage sales ("theocrapology"); endorsing an official food to give up during Lent; or a national cell-phone policy for religious celebrations.

For the reader in Springfield who is going to write a testy note: We were only kidding about asking the bishops to develop a secret Catholic handshake. Clearly, the National Council of Catholic Men can handle (get it? hand-le?) that.

We have thought of a public protest — maybe standing outside the meeting wearing sandwich boards and neon orange road pylons as hats. Or we could dress as a favorite picnic item, my personal favorite being Mrs. Castagna's guacamole.

Domestic violence: A real nightmare

I used to think domestic violence only happened behind closed doors in inner cities and Third-World countries. It certainly didn't happen to intelligent women who chose compatible life partners. It didn't happen to educated, successful women who graduated summa cum laude from prestigious universities.

Then I began to meet them and hear their stories. One was my college roommate's close friend. She divorced the guy after lying to herself for years that they somehow would work it out. Another was a family member who is now living apart from the batterer but has resumed communication.

But by far the saddest story to date came via e-mail from a friend.

A woman with whom she went to school, Bree Schuette, met her future husband, Mikhail, while studying for her Ph.D. in economics from Boston University. Their first child, Veronika, was born in January 2000. A few months later they traveled to Russia to introduce Veronika to her paternal grandparents.

In her Web site (<http://veronika65.tripod.com/index.html>), Bree tells of the events that then unfolded. She reports that Mikhail refused to allow her and Veronika to return to the United States, and he forbade her to communicate with friends and family back home.

This smart, capable woman felt trapped in a violently abusive marriage.

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

She reports suffering broken fingers, ribs, wrists and four concussions. When she was taken to the hospital after the most severe injuries, Mikhail refused to pay for recommended medical treatment. As is the case with many victims of domestic violence, she was cut off from any support system, and she was ashamed of what was happening.

In February 2001, their son Valerij was born. Bree reports that when Valerij was 16 months old he was abused to death by his father, who forced her to watch a gruesome video recording of it. Somehow in between life threats and bloody assaults, Bree found the strength to attempt numerous escapes from Russia with Veronika. Finally, with the help of the American consulate, she successfully fled — but without her daughter.

Knowing that if she were dead she couldn't help her daughter, she made "Sophie's Choice" and returned home, to Minneapolis, Minn., with only the clothes on her back and eight photos of her children. There she recovered from her injuries and with her parents' help started a domestic violence awareness campaign to plead her case for her daughter's safe return.

Risking her own safety again, she returned to St. Petersburg in late August to press charges against her estranged husband for abuse of her and the murder of their son, and with the hope of bringing Veronika home at the end of the trial.

On her Web site, Bree chronicles her horrific story, posts press releases and other information about domestic violence, and provides the addresses for Russian officials to whom readers may write petitions online or otherwise on her behalf.

Bree's parents, Linda and Gary Schuette, also are coordinating outreach efforts in the United States. They are available to speak about domestic abuse and may be reached at bringveronikahome@yahoo.com.

Today one out of every three women experiences at least one physical assault by a partner during adulthood, according to a 1996 study by the American Psychological Association.

A new survey by the Center for the Advancement of Women indicates that 92 percent of American women rank domestic and sexual violence as one of their top priorities.

It happens so regularly that it rarely makes headlines anymore, which is why it is so important to write and talk and do something about it.

Taking care of the poor, taking care of yourself

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Many saints we commemorate throughout the liturgical year remind us to reach out to the poor.

Take, for example, St. Vincent de Paul, who devoted his life to the peasantry of France. In his writings he tells us that as Christ was born of a poor family, served the poor and picked his apostles from the poor, so too should we be concerned for the poor.

In the Mass for St. Vincent de Paul, the Gospel speaks of Christ pitying the crowds because they are like sheep without a shepherd. Serving the poor involves caring for those who lack necessities in life. But there is another side of this: caring for oneself. Giving hands-on care can be more demanding than it may seem.

Reaching out to the poor is all about exercising the virtue of charity. Nonetheless, we have to expect at times to be rebuffed, taken advantage of or overwhelmed.

In Washington, D.C., we have many homeless people milling along Pennsylvania Ave. On cold days, I have seen social workers try to distribute blankets and encourage them to go into shelters. Often this kind gesture is met by curses and rejection.

There are also homeless who hang around the train station and restaurants. Some are truly in need, others are operators who know all the tricks of making you feel guilty. Some use the money they receive for drugs and alcohol.

What is most agonizing about concern for the poor is that there are so many truly poor people who need care. When we take this seriously, it tears the heart out of us.

A rule seasoned caregivers follow, whether serving the poor or a loved one, is that being kind to others requires that you definitely be kind to yourself.

There have been many who tried following St. Vincent de Paul's example but stopped because of burnout. They took on everyone's problems, but never took off time for themselves. In some circles, this is called the "Messiah complex."

Another rule caregivers follow is to disconnect every so often. If we spend a lot of time with people who tend to lack hope, we may grow negative, leaving ourselves open to disillusionment and depression.

Caretakers must take care to surround themselves with healthy, energetic people.

Charity not only requires love. It requires wisdom.

Faith on film

Movies can bring faithful together

I like the movies. A good movie can transport you away to another place and time. It can hold up a mirror to our world. A film can make us feel and see things we otherwise would miss.

The success last year of Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ" reawakened a lot of us to the idea that movies can be a spiritual experience. That is why our parish is going to start a new program. We call it "Faith on Film."

Over the course of a year we are going to show 20 movies. Afterward, if people want they will be invited to discuss the themes raised by these films.

The movies will not just be about overtly religious themes, like the "Ten Commandments." They also will be films that awaken in us a religious sense or explore a theme of our faith.

As part of preparing for this program, I asked our parish film critic, a 14-year-old boy named Daniel, to give me a list. Dan has seen practically every major movie ever made. He really knows his cinema.

He came back with some good ideas: "A Man for All Seasons," "Lilies of the Field" and "The Shoes of the Fisherman." He also wanted a "Lord of the Rings" festival. (Not sure we can do that.)

I asked some older people. They wanted nostalgic films of their youth, including "Going My Way," "The Bells of St. Mary's" and "The Song of Bernadette."

Some others suggested sentimental favorites like "The Miracle of Marcelino," "Boys Town" and "The Nun's Story."

Historical classics about the church are good candidates. That list might include "Ben-Hur" and "Becket."

There are lots of movies about the saints, including "Brother Sun, Sister Moon" (about St. Francis of Assisi), and "Saint Joan."

Some movies made for television are also on the list, like "Catholics" and "The Prisoner" (about Cardinal Mindszenty).

Catholic social teaching could be discussed with movies like "On the Waterfront" and "The Mission" and "Romero."

Catholic novels on film also make the list, such as "Diary of a Country Priest," "The Power and the Glory" and "Monsignor Quixote."

Some films are not overtly religious, but they evoke a religious sensitivity. On that list we might show "Chariots of Fire," "A Raisin in the Sun" and "Babette's Feast" (a eucharistic theme).

Sports movies also have religious possibilities. Among the ones that come to mind are "Brian's Song" and "Rudy"

(about a guy who wanted to play for Notre Dame).

The idea is to use entertainment to teach and edify.

If you are like me, you probably don't really like watching movies alone. With other people the experience is better. It is nice to hear others react to the screen in their laughs, gasps and sighs.

Our parish is blessed to have a good theater with a great sound system, so it will be just like a real movie experience. The only difference is that we won't charge anything for the movies (we will of course pay all the required royalties).

I think that this could be a good little experiment. When I was in Italy in the 1980s, I remember that a lot of parishes had a "salone del cine" (a movie room) where they showed films once a week. It was a great way to bring people together, a painless way to educate.

I'm looking forward to this series myself. During a cheap night out without going anywhere, we can be transported everywhere.

Film suggestions can be e-mailed to Father Daly at sjo@chesapeake.net.

St. Bernadette Church in Linville stands in the shadow of Grandfather Mountain in Avery County.

LINVILLE — While the mission church in Linville placed under the patronage of St. Bernadette is only 17 years old, its lineage dates back decades thanks to a growing Catholic presence in the area during the 1930s.

In 1935, a chapel dedicated to St. Bernadette was established in Spruce Pine, 15 miles southwest of Linville. A new church was built on the site in 1938, and was renamed St. Lucien in memory of the principal benefactor's deceased daughter.

The church and rectory were dedicated and blessed in August 1940.

Back in Linville, then-Bishop Eugene McGuinness of Raleigh had founded a mission in June 1940 to serve the Catholics in Avery County. L.W. and Marion Driscoll of New York, who owned a chapel in the Linville township, donated the structure to the diocese.

Dedicated to the service of God and named St. Patricia Chapel by Bishop McGuinness, the little church opened its doors to area Catholics for more than 40 years, all the while as a mission of St. Lucien Church.

By the last 1970s, the North Carolina mountains had become a popular summer vacation spot, and the 30-seat St. Patricia Chapel could no longer accommodate the number of Catholics — both resident and visiting — coming to worship. Masses were added, but that solution too became inadequate.

Priests began celebrating weekend Masses in a Beech Mountain restaurant, at Lees-McRae College, in Linville Episcopal Church and finally in a Presbyterian church in Banner Elk, while daily Mass continued to be celebrated at St. Patricia Chapel. In November 1987, the diocese returned the chapel to the Driscoll family.

A building fund was established in 1977 by Father Henry Becker, and he began searching for a location for the new Catholic church. One of his successors, Father John Pagel, took charge of the building project and in November 1984, the Diocese of Charlotte purchased a 10-acre tract of land facing Grandfather Mountain.

Fund-raising efforts continued for three years within the Catholic community of Linville.

In 1987, then-Bishop John F. Donoghue gave his approval for building to begin. Special emphasis was placed on capturing the beauty of the North Carolina mountains in and at the church.

The exterior was created in part with stone from the Linville area, and the sanctuary's rear wall was fashioned of glass to allow a view of Grandfather Mountain and its famous mile-high swinging bridge.

The first Mass was celebrated in the new St. Bernadette Church Dec. 31, 1988. Bishop Donoghue dedicated the building in June 1989. Father Richard McCue, a retired U.S. Navy chaplain and now a retired diocesan priest, was pastor at that time.

Father Aloysius D'Silva was installed as pastor of St. Lucien Church and its mission, St. Bernadette Church, in November 1994. In addition to the local parishioners who call St. Bernadette Church their spiritual home, Father D'Silva celebrated Mass with hundreds of vacationers who frequented the area year-round, especially in the summer months.

On New Year's Eve 1998, the community of St. Bernadette Church celebrated its 10th anniversary together as a family of faith. During the summer of 1999, a grotto honoring the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Bernadette was dedicated.

In the spring of 2002, Father Kurt Fohn was appointed as administrator of St. Lucien and St. Bernadette churches by then-Bishop William G. Curlin. In the summer of 2003, Bishop Peter J. Jugis appointed Father Christopher Gober as pastor of both churches.

The church responds to a number of needs in Avery County. Parishioners are involved in prison ministry, hospice, literacy programs, Habitat for Humanity and Boone Crisis Pregnancy Center.

St. Bernadette Church continues to serve as a testimony to the evangelical spirit of Catholicism in the North Carolina mountains.

Much done to protect children from abuse, says archbishop

BY AGOSTINO BONO

WASHINGTON —

Children are safer in the church now because of sex abuse prevention policies adopted by the U.S. bishops two years ago, said Archbishop Harry J. Flynn of St. Paul-Minneapolis, head of the bishops' committee that oversees review of the policies.

In an Oct. 13 telephone interview, he added that public confidence in the Catholic Church, which diminished because of the clergy sex abuse scandal, "will be built up again, but it will be a gradual thing."

Archbishop Flynn is chairman of the bishops' Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse, which is supervising a two-year review of the sex Transformations come in many ways. According to Marlene Pratto, visiting a sister parish will help.

"The people ... make you cry with their warm, sincere welcome. They shower you with love. They will make you think you are a long lost relative, they are so happy to see you," she said.

Pratto was among a group of 10 people from St. Pius X Church in Greensboro to visit their sister parish of Santiago in Manazo, Peru April 18-29. A parish group makes the trip to the Peruvian HOME SWEET HOME?

A homeless child sleeps under an old rusty car on a street in Cairo, Egypt, Aug. 20. During a Vatican-sponsored conference on street children, Archbishop Agostino Marchetto said the United Nations and Amnesty International estimate that there are between 100 million and 150 million street children in the world.

Pastoral workers urge adapting street kid programs to local realities

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Father Guy Gilbert does not look like your ordinary priest: Sporting a star-studded, black leather motorcycle jacket and smoking rolled cigarettes, he seems more like the street kids he has been helping in Paris for the past 40 years.

And that is precisely the point.

"At the beginning, dressing like this helped me enter into contact with young people. I will dress like this till the end of my days," said the priest, whose organization, La Bergerie de Faucon, has the mission of saving troubled teenagers' souls.

"We want young people to understand that one is not born a delinquent, but one becomes a delinquent, and that one can stop being a delinquent through a strong educative program," Father Gilbert said.

The French priest was one of several pastoral workers from 20 countries — most from the developing world — who attended the first international meeting on the pastoral care of street children sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers.

During the Oct. 25-26 meeting, Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the council, said the United Nations and Amnesty International estimate that there are between 100 million and 150 million street children in the world.

The council's primary objective, he said, "is to make bishops take responsibility at the local level" for developing a pastoral outreach to such children, while recognizing the value of programs carried out by Catholic and other private organizations.

Participants at the conference emphasized the need to adapt programs to the specific realities in which the children are living, Archbishop Marchetto said.

Family breakups are the leading cause of children on the street, followed by emigration and poverty, said Mario Pollo, a professor at Rome's Libera Università Maria Santissima Assunta.

"It's mainly a city phenomenon," he said, citing the example of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, where an estimated 12,000-18,000 children live on the streets. "Emigration from the countryside has created internal hells within these megalopolises."

But Brazil is one of the countries where the phenomenon is actually declining.

"In countries like Brazil and Romania, both churches and public institutions have put up a good fight against it," Pollo said.

"The fight against this should not just be in the hands of a few prophets, but a permanent feature of the ecclesiastical community and society at large," he said.

Other programs represented at the October conference aim to alleviate the causes of children living on the streets, particularly poverty.

Columban Father Shay Cullen, director of the Philippines' PREDA Foundation, an association that has been nominated multiple times for the Nobel Peace Prize, said UNICEF figures show more than 60,000 girls in the Philippines work as prostitutes. The PREDA Foundation also has programs to rehabilitate them.

"Why are there 100 million child sex slaves in the world? Even half that number would be shocking," the priest said. "This leads us to reflection on the human spirit."

Nuncio says religious groups have right to participate in public life

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican's U.N. nuncio Oct. 26 called for the international community to recognize that religious freedom includes the right of religious groups to participate in public life as well as the right of individuals to freedom of conscience.

"The attitude of those who would like to confine religious expression to the merely private sphere ignores and denies the nature of authentic religious convictions," said Archbishop Celestino Migliore.

Legal structures ought to "foster the contribution of believers to the common good of society" rather than seek to restrict it, he said.

The nuncio made his comments to a committee of the U.N. General Assembly reviewing questions of human rights.

Religious groups ought to be allowed to work in social, educational and humanitarian fields, and to do so while remaining religiously distinct, he said.

He said enabling them to operate in an openly religious way would enrich "a genuine culture of pluralism" and provide much needed services to the poor, the vulnerable and the needy.

But "attempts to secularize or to interfere in the internal affairs of religious institutions would undermine their raison d'être," he said.

While emphasizing the importance and comprehensive nature of religious freedom, Archbishop Migliore also said religious leaders have a special responsibility to prevent "any misuse or misrepresentation of religious beliefs and freedom."

He said they are "called to create and spread a sensitivity" that would "never turn to acts of terror" but would "reject and condemn such acts as a profanation of religion."

Archbishop Migliore concluded by telling the international community that the Vatican would continue to defend religious freedom vigorously.

Pope says scouting important tool to help young people learn values

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Catholic scouting is an important tool for helping young people learn the value of being faithful to God and true to others, Pope John Paul II said.

The pope met Oct. 23 with 40,000 Italian Catholic Scouts and Guides in St. Peter's Square. He told the smallest members — the Cubs and Ladybugs — "to do your best every day to grow joyfully" and to discover "the marvels of creation."

The pope asked the Guides and Scouts to be always ready to do good, to learn to be responsible and to become active members of their parishes and communities.

He asked the older members, the Sentries and Rovers, "to commit yourselves to making the word 'service' the motto of your lives in the conviction that giving of oneself is the secret to making your existence beautiful and fruitful."

The pope asked the den and troop leaders to help the young people learn the values and social skills that will enable them "to contribute to building a world of friendship and solidarity."

"Be men and women who, basing their lives on the Gospel of Jesus, know how to educate others to live in freedom and with responsibility, to swim against the current in order to defeat the temptations of individualism, laziness and apathy," he told them.

Pope John Paul told the Italian scouting organization, "Do not be afraid to advance with imagination, wisdom and courage on the path of educating young generations."

Pope says he prays daily for, suffers with Iraqi victims of terrorism

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II made a special appeal for Iraq, saying he suffered with the victims of terrorism there.

At the end of his weekly audience Oct. 27, the pope said he prayed daily for the people of Iraq who are "intent on the reconstruction of their country."

He expressed his "affectionate participation" in the pain of the families of victims and the suffering of hostages "and of all the innocent people struck by the blind barbarity of terrorism."

Christians, he said, should continue to "offer their fundamental contribution for the reconciliation of hearts" in the violence-torn country.

Pope names Nobel physicist, Indian scientist to sciences academy

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II has named as members of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences a Nobel-winning physicist and one of the world's leading experts on how the use of aerosol sprays contributes to global warming.

The Vatican announced the appointments of the two U.S.-based researchers Oct. 23.

William D. Phillips, 55, won the Nobel Prize in physics in 1997; he is a professor of physics at the University of Maryland in College Park and leader of the Laser Cooling and Trapping Group of the Atomic Physics Division of the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

Veerabhadran Ramanathan, 59, a native of India, currently serves as director of the Center for Atmospheric Sciences at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla, Calif.

The Vatican said his research focuses on "how human activities influence the climate and environment of our planet."

The Pontifical Academy of Sciences brings together 80 scientists, about one-fourth of whom are Nobel laureates, from around the world to promote scientific research and to examine scientific questions of interest to the church. Members are chosen according to their expertise; most of them are not Catholic.

Standing on faith

Over the course of three hours, nearly two dozen people, primarily from St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, lined up with placards outside the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Oct. 29. Carrying signs with mostly political messages, the group came to express their opposition to pre-emptive war, capital punishment and poverty, among other issues.

The group was soon joined by nearly 40 adults and children, primarily from St. Mark Church in Huntersville, who arrived with signs stating "We Support Our Bishop" and "You Can't Be Catholic and Pro-Abortion."

In August, Bishop Jugis, along with Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston, issued a letter stating that Catholic politicians who persistently supported abortion may not be admitted to Communion in their dioceses.

Before long, some members from both groups — who all said they were concerned with pro-life issues — joined hands in prayer before parting ways.

PEACE EFFORTS IN IRAQ

Speaker gives her take on Iraq as volunteer with peacekeeping group UNIVERSITY HEIGHTS, Ohio (CNS) — Participants in the National Young Adult Conference got a personal look at one young American's take on the war in Iraq Oct. 16.

Sheila Provencher, who spent the last eight months in Iraq as a member of Christian Peacemaker Teams, spoke about her experiences in Iraq during the Oct. 15-17 conference at Jesuit-run John Carroll University in University Heights.

Provencher recalled standing at an intersection in Baghdad, Iraq with a group of human rights protesters, holding pictures of Iraqi detainees and asking for policy changes and understanding.

An angry Iraqi man approached the protesters and asked them why they were helping terrorists, she said. He shouted at them, asking them why they were not there when Iraqi President Saddam Hussein was in power or when he killed the man's family and thousands of other innocent Iraqi people.

Provencher said she was overwhelmed and couldn't hold back tears. She said she told the man she was just one person and there was only so much she could do.

She apologized for the atrocities the man had faced and told him she would pray for him. In response to her compassion, the man also began to cry. They stood there in the middle of that busy intersection and wept and said they would pray for each other.

Such are the experiences that inspire 32-year-old Provencher and reinforce her call to a life of service.

In December 2002, she joined a two-week delegation to Iraq as part of Catholic Peace Journey. She traveled with other Catholic leaders in meeting with Iraqi physicians, families and children, and religious leaders in an effort to avert the war.

She returned to Iraq last December with Christian Peacemaker Teams, an ecumenical pacifist organization that sends groups of volunteers to places plagued by violence in an effort to bring peace.

Her mission was to meet with religious leaders, military officials and Iraqi detainees and their families to push for policy change and work toward nonviolence.

With the current situation in Iraq, Provencher finds hope in individual encounters with Iraqi people, such as the man at the busy intersection in Baghdad.

LIFTING SPIRITS

Girl Scouts send care packages, receive responses

GREENSBORO — Members of Girl Scout Troop 533 are receiving letters of thanks for sending pieces of "home"-to Americans far away.

While selling their famed Girl Scout cookies last spring, the Scouts, now fourth-graders, asked customers to donate boxes to U.S. military personnel overseas. The troop accumulated approximately 100 cookie boxes in three "Boxes for Baghdad" care packages.

For the third year in a row, the Scouts also sent a care package to U.S. embassy personnel in Tel Aviv, Israel.

"The girls weren't expecting a response," said Margaret Burnham, a mother who assisted her daughter's troop with the care packages. "It was touching for them to receive so many responses to something they did out of the goodness of their hearts."

"Yesterday at mail call here in my desert outpost, I was surprised to see a huge box addressed to me from St. Pius X Catholic School in Greensboro," wrote Army Cpt. Dan Dutilly, who is stationed in Iraq. Dutilly's relative, Rose Messick, has been active with Troop 533.

"Know that you have touched a lot of soldiers' lives and made their days better here," he wrote.

"The Girl Scout cookies sent to us by your troop were enjoyed by many in my battalion," wrote Sgt. Jacob Poma, a U.S. Marine serving in Iraq. "Small comforts from home keep our spirits high."

"I want to commend you all for your generosity and community spirit," wrote Dorothy Shea, a diplomat at the U.S. embassy in Tel Aviv and aunt to troop member Madeline Burnham. "Thanks, God bless and DGUOP," she wrote.

DGUOP is the acronym for Troop 533's motto: "Don't Give Up On Peace."

highlands every two years to visit their sister parishioners and see the programs sponsored by St. Pius X Church.

"At every liturgy, we pray for our sister parish and they pray for us. We work together in a collaborative way through ministry and prayer," said Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church and a participant of the recent trip.

"To go down and experience the welcome and warmth of the people and culture strengthens this bond," he said. "It's a transformative experience for those who go. It's a moving, spiritual experience to see the people with whom we've been working and praying."

"We meet with the mayor, the parish priest and the leaders of the Educate-A-Child, Artesanias Pachamas and Comedor programs," said Pratto. "We determine how best to spend the funds we bring, observe the needs we will work on next, listen to the people and hug the children."

Manazo is a small town in the Andean mountains near the Bolivian border. Manazo is more than 12,000 feet above sea level, where the air is thin, said Pratto.

"This year we were fortunate to have a native of Peru, Yuri Romero, travel with us and translate all the greetings and reports," said Pratto. "He helped in our discussions with the (community) leaders."

The St. Pius X Church Peru ministry began about 20 years ago when former pastor Father George Kloster met Sister Barbara Philippart, a Sister of Charity from Cincinnati. Sister Philippart had worked in Manazo for 20 years and started the Artesanias Pachamas, a cooperative of women who spend their days knitting. She taught the women how to improve the quality of their knitting and guided them in business practices.

Each November, St. Pius X Church sells sweaters, scarves, mittens, dolls and other handcrafts made by the Artesanias Pachamas. After import and export fees and operating costs, all money generated from the sale goes to the women, who participate in an equitable system of profit sharing.

"The sale provides income for the women that they wouldn't otherwise have," said Msgr. Marcaccio. "They rely on the sweater sale to help feed their families."

The St. Pius X Church group received a report on their contributions to the Educate-A-Child program, which helps children receive uniforms, school supplies and tutoring sessions; and they met with cooks and patrons of the Comedor, a program providing hot lunches to needy children and the elderly.

"The children often walk miles to go to school. The Comedor provides these children with lunch, which they otherwise wouldn't have," said Msgr. Marcaccio.

Students at St. Pius X School also help support the Comedor program. The students are able to forego wearing uniforms on Fridays by making contributions to the Comedor lunch program.

"It makes you appreciate the great benefits that two parishes, miles apart, can receive when they work together," said Msgr. Marcaccio.

Marlene Pratto contributed to this story.

Peru's new gas system hailed as economic key, but some have doubts

CAMISEA, Peru (CNS) — A new system that will provide natural gas from Peru's southern jungle to domestic consumers is being hailed as key to this impoverished nation's economic future.

But the production facilities and pipeline through the rain forest, as well as new oil drilling in indigenous territory, have highlighted ongoing questions about development projects in fragile environments that are also home to indigenous people.

The project's developers have taken the necessary precautions, said Bishop Juan Larraneta Olleta of Puerto Maldonado, whose apostolic vicariate includes the project and surrounding communities of Machiguenga, Nahua and Nanti indigenous people.

Some indigenous communities along the pipeline right-of-way have complained about erosion and landslides that have fouled rivers and killed fish, threatening their food supply.

Embodying stewardship

"God has been very good to us," Joan Surber said. "It's not an idea of paying back. It's doing something for a friend. If you can help, you do."

"Stewardship is expressed in time, talent and treasure," Charlie Surber added. "They're gifts from God."

The Surbers are grateful that, in their 70s, they are still in good health. So they enjoy helping to set up for the church's Wednesday-night potluck dinners. They are eucharistic ministers and attend daily Mass, praying the rosary with others before the service.

Joan Surber chairs the pastoral council and has been a member of the family affairs committee. They worked on the recent capital campaign to raise money for the new church building.

"They're very generous," said Augustinian Father Dennis McGowan, St. John the Evangelist Church's pastor. "They give totally of themselves."

In addition to all her parish activities, Joan Surber is treasurer for Haywood ProLife.

"We both feel if you belong to something, you should do something," she said. "You really should be active. You have an obligation. We enjoy it."

She helps clean the church and offices while her husband waters the flowers. He used to sing in the choir but now devotes himself to church flowers.

"If you have a talent, you should use it," he said. "I didn't know I would get involved in floral design."

Actually, he got involved some years ago. Out of work as a computer systems analyst in New York City, a friend suggested Surber buy a florist shop in Florida.

He made a success of the business, which he later sold before he and his wife moved to Waynesville 10 years ago. Now, he's designing the church's floral arrangements.

"Any new job is a challenge and an opportunity to learn," he said. "God knows when you'll need it."

He's also interested in film, spending a year making a video record of parish activities.

The stewardship committee, of which Joan Surber is a member, meets monthly to plan various activities and to update the stewardship book. The book has contact information and a brief description of each stewardship group, including lectors, eucharistic ministers, altar servers, Open Door soup kitchen, church cleaning, grounds beautification, maintenance, church library, office help, RCIA, youth ministry, women's circle and the food pantry.

About half of the parish's 200 households are involved in some form of stewardship at the church, Father McGowan said.

"To me it's been really great, watching all the stuff that people get involved in," Joan Surber said, "and all the people you meet."

She added that being active in various parish ministries is a good way to get to know people who don't attend the same Mass she does.

"She keeps an eye out, gets new people involved," Fred Cremer said of Joan Surber.

Cremer, who has been a St. John the Evangelist parishioner for three years, is now starting to head up the family affairs committee. Joan, he said, has "been breaking me in easy. It's a small parish and quite active, a lot of good things going on."

"Just going to Mass and going home isn't enough," Charlie Surber said. "You don't have a parish life unless you get involved."

Stewards brave hurricane for conference

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — The threat of Hurricane Ivan could not stop Christ's disciples from the 2004 International Catholic Stewardship Conference in New Orleans Sept. 12-15.

Eleven people from six parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte were among the 2,000 participants from 11 nations at the conference, brought together to explore and share ideas of fostering the stewardship concepts of giving of time, talent and treasure by Catholics.

Ironically, the disruption the hurricane caused at the conference — the last half-day of the conference was cancelled — benefited those who stayed.

Those participants spent time sharing ideas and resources in the hotel lobby. That personal communication was one of the highlights of the conference, said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte and a speaker at the conference.

"Why re-invent the wheel every time you need to facilitate stewardship?" Gaddy asked. "Everyone was encouraged and willing to share ideas from their own dioceses."

"Each of us gained much from the conference, particularly that making new parishioners feel welcome will in turn lead to greater participation, hence, increasing stewardship," said MaryBeth Conrad, ministry coordinator for St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. "We are working on ways to increase hospitality in our church, and it will require the efforts of everyone."

"Stewardship is an expression of our need to give back out of our gratitude to God for his gifts to us," said Gaddy. "It is not just a program in our churches — it's a way of life."

Aquinas and Luther on marriage

Clergy, scholars discuss topic at annual conference

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — God created marriage according to his own special design, with certain ends and essential properties, said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

"Neither the church nor the state can alter the basic meaning and structure of marriage, because God is the author," said Bishop Jugis, speaking at the banquet of the 12th annual Aquinas-Luther conference at Lenoir-Rhyne College Oct. 21-23.

Bishop Jugis was one of several speakers at the conference, themed "Aquinas and Luther on Marriage and Sex," which brought together distinguished scholars, clergy and laity to discuss fresh insights into the thoughts of the Catholic theologian St. Thomas Aquinas and the Protestant theologian Martin Luther.

Sponsored by the college's Center for Theology, the conference was co-hosted by the Hickory Lutheran-Roman Catholic Covenant Committee, consisting of St. Aloysius Catholic Church, and Mt. Olive, Holy Trinity and St. Andrew's Lutheran churches.

Bishop Jugis discussed the Roman Catholic theology of marriage, reading several passages from the book of Genesis during his talk and listing the ends and the essential properties of marriage.

He said marriage was designed to be an exclusive and permanent relationship between one man and one woman. The purposes of marriage are the mutual assistance of spouses and the procreation and education of children, he said.

"No other form of relationship that the human mind can imagine can fit within these parameters," said Bishop Jugis.

Both Aquinas and Luther came to these same conclusions in their writings, said Dr. Janet E. Smith, a professor at Sacred Heart Major Seminary in Detroit.

Smith gave the keynote address at the conference at Holy Trinity Lutheran Church Oct. 21.

Both Aquinas and Luther emphasized the importance of marriage and fidelity to protect the welfare of children, women and society as a whole, said Smith.

"If you reach 20, 30, 40 years of marriage, you've done the community a great service," she said. "A marriage that lasts shows that two people have worked very hard at something."

Aquinas instructed that both parents were needed to instruct children for adulthood and bring them up to worship God, said Smith, and that marriage should be indissoluble and exclusive because it protected the welfare of women.

According to Aquinas, said Smith, if a man divorces his wife to marry someone else after the children are grown, or has more than one wife at the same time, the partnership of marriage is more like slavery.

Smith cited several studies during her talk to support the view that marriage, as it was originally designed, was the ideal for creation. Divorce, same-sex unions, polygamy, premarital sex and contraception all contradict or interfere with this design, she said, and all lead to societal or medical problems.

"Every day I read something that reinforces that natural law," she said.

Conference participants attended other lectures and panel discussions by Dr. Philip E. Blosser, professor of philosophy at Lenoir-Rhyne College; Rev. Richard Niebanck, retired pastor of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America; John Pless, assistant professor and director of field education at Concordia Theological Seminary, Fort Wayne, Ind.; and Rev. Patrick Henry Reardon, pastor of All Saints' Orthodox Church in Chicago.

The Center for Theology has hosted the conference for 12 years as a means of healing the split between Catholics and Protestants.

According to the center's Web site, the conferences have provided provocative insights into both Aquinas and Luther, including common theological terrain between the two as well as specific points of disagreement that clarify issues most urgently needing reconciliation.

The first conference, held in November 1993, was entitled "Aquinas and Luther: Friends or Foes?" The second conference dealt with Aquinas and Luther on the topic of the most recent international "Lutheran/Catholic Dialogue: The Church in the Light of the Doctrine of Justification."

Other topics covered in recent years included "Morality," "Spirituality," "Authority of the Bible," "Worship," "Holy Trinity," "Justification," "Proclamation: Preaching and Teaching" and "On War and Peace."

Horton implements weather-tracking software

CHARLOTTE — Lisa Horton, computer teacher at St. Ann School in Charlotte, received a Teaching Leadership Award Oct. 8.

The award, presented by John Saaty, senior vice president and general manager of WeatherNet, in recognition of Horton's contributions to the St. Ann School's students and teachers for the 2004-05 year.

Last year, St. Ann School and Providence Day School in Charlotte became the only two elementary schools in Mecklenburg County to install American Weather Service's WeatherNet reporting stations. The instruments, on the roof of St. Ann School, collect weather data and transmit it to AWS, the world's largest private weather network.

The data is shared with more than 6,000 school sites and 100 television stations across the country, including WBTV in Charlotte. In recent months, Horton's students used the technology to track the various hurricanes affecting the Diocese of Charlotte.

In addition to a certificate, Horton received a Lead Teacher Starter Kit for AWS's WeatherBug software for implementation in the classrooms. The equipment will be tied into the televisions in the fourth- and fifth-grade science classes.

Cultural group performs at Asheville Catholic

Students experience African song, music

CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Students in Asheville recently got another taste of Africa.

In late March, Asheville Catholic School spent a week immersed in African culture with the Shabu family, a cultural arts group working in the Raleigh-Durham area of North Carolina.

The Shabu family returned to the school to present Djembe Fire, a program with drums, song and dance in the school gymnasium Oct. 15. Asheville Catholic School also presented a free performance by the Shabu family that evening at the University of North Carolina at Asheville.

Several students performed with the family at the university, as well as at a performance during the Lake Eden Arts Festival held at Camp Rockmont in Black Mountain that weekend.

The Shabu family's initial visit was part of the school's yearlong Artists-in-Residence program. The family, originally from West Africa, is the core of the Magic of African Rhythm group, which specializes in various forms of cultural artistic expression, including drumming, singing, dancing and visual artistic expression.

African drumming, music and song were part of the performance by the Shabu family at Asheville Catholic School Oct. 15.

Oct. 15, Maisha "Mama" Shabu told the students they would receive a "taste of a village named Kindia."

The students' "trip" to the village began early in the morning, said Shabu, when the villagers were preparing for the day — men heading into the forest to cut trees; women pounding millet for food, going for water with large bowls, planting seeds and gardening.

"By noon, it is hot, time to relax," said Shabu. "A time to drink cold drinks, perhaps nap."

"As soon as the sun goes down, it is time to celebrate with music."

The Shabu family, performers and "warrior dancers" led the students in song and dance. Several times the performers changed costumes and instruments, including the kora, ngoni and bala.

Benedictine monk on personal crusade to debunk 'The Da Vinci Code'

BY LUCILLE S. UHLMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DENVILLE, N.J. — If you want a good read, indulge yourself in "The Da Vinci Code," a best-selling novel by Dan Brown, Benedictine Father Gerard Lair told a crowd at St. Mary's Church in Denville.

"Just don't believe a word of it," he said.

"This book misrepresents facts and history over and over again, that's why it's so dangerous," said Father Lair.

"Even the title of the book is incorrect," said Father Lair, who noted that artists of that time were generally referred to by their first names, like Raphael and Michelangelo. The book should really be "The Leonardo Code," he said. "Da Vinci only means 'from the town of Vinci.'"

Father Lair is the former abbot of St. Mary's Abbey in Morristown, in the Diocese for Paterson. Currently, he coordinates continuing education for the Benedictine monks at the abbey.

He often speaks on "The Da Vinci Code" at various places and has made debunking it his personal crusade.

"I'm persuaded that it's so loaded with error it would be helpful for someone to reveal it," he said "I see it as part of my ministry."

The best seller, published in March 2003, is a historical suspense novel full of bloodthirsty conspiracies and unorthodox theories about God, Jesus and Mary Magdalene.

It begins with the premise that Leonardo da Vinci used his art to communicate secret knowledge about the Holy Grail. It then claims that early Christians did not see Jesus as divine and also criticizes the church for keeping secret thousands of texts that detail Christ's humanity.

Father Lair is convinced that one of the reasons for the book's success was the timing of its release, just a few months after Cardinal Bernard F. Law resigned as archbishop of Boston over his handling of the clergy abuse cases.

"We learned of the bishops' conspiracy of silence on that issue," he said, claiming that realization caused an increased interest in real or imagined conspiracies.

A major premise of the book, the priest noted, is that Jesus was married to Mary Magdalene and they had at least one child, whose descendants formed a French royal dynasty in the Middle Ages that continues to the present day.

The book asserts that the early church suppressed Christ's marriage and subsequent descendants, but the secret has been kept throughout the ages by a shadowy cult.

"There is no historical basis or documentation for the marriage idea," said Father Lair, adding, "Why would the New Testament writers have held it back? They weren't eye witnesses to the events, and would have been told of the 'marriage' by those who were."

Father Lair explained that the Gospels were written between 70 and 95 A.D. and only attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John in 150 A.D. Brown claims that the "secret" was kept because a marriage and fatherhood would emphasize Jesus' humanity over his divinity, and the early church wanted the divinity prominent.

"The book says that Jesus' divinity had to be 'declared' by the Emperor Constantine as a result of the First Council of Nicaea in 325 A.D.," said Father Lair. "In fact, there had been no attempt to deny Jesus' humanity or divinity."

The priest also addressed the issue of Leonardo Da Vinci's 1498 painting, "The Last Supper."

Brown says the figure to Jesus' immediate right in the painting is Mary Magdalene. But according to Father Lair, the writer's theory literally doesn't add up; there are only 13 people in the painting: If one is Mary Magdalene and the central figure is Jesus, which of the Twelve Apostles is missing?

The priest suggests that those who wish to read the book should realize that it is based on faulty or nonexistent scholarship, and that its detractors need not have positive proof of their side of the story.

Jesus source of strength in dark times

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I remember my mother telling me during my growing up years that the time was coming when I would have to think for myself and she would not be there to give me advice. Of course, in my more rebellious years I couldn't wait for that day to arrive.

However, I now realize her straightforward wisdom, faith in God and unrelenting love were to form the bedrock of my life.

On Sept. 11, 2001, my job was to explain the unexplainable to a room full of high school students. After all, I was the adult in charge; these young people needed someone who could remain calm and truthful. Even though I felt like crying, swearing, screaming and praying all at once, my silent prayer for wisdom prevailed. As the day wore on, more information filled the void.

I think the realization that we had witnessed great evil in action settled over students and teachers like an enormous pall.

Sitting in my empty room at the close of the day, I thought of my mother who long ago heard the news of Pearl Harbor on a Sunday afternoon. In those days television and the information superhighway were parts of science fiction. In the midst of this reverie, I had one of those "I wish she were here" moments.

If only we could talk about how she survived the war years in southeastern Colorado. How did she cope out in the middle of nowhere, depending on the newspaper from a town 90 miles away to bring the latest news? How did she live with the fear that an Army officer would come to the door and tell her that the brother who survived Pearl Harbor was lost in the Pacific?

This week's reading from Luke's Gospel begins with Jesus warning his listeners that the temple that has been the center of their worship soon will be destroyed. Not only will the actual building come down, but a new understanding of Jesus, himself, will soon emerge. Jesus describes catastrophic events that will culminate in the martyrdom of his followers.

However, he assures his listeners that they will secure their lives — their eternal lives — through perseverance. Jesus makes this promise to those believers of long ago and to us, because of his unrelenting love.

'Little Flower' blossoms in film about saint's life

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — "Therese" is an earnest, if modest, dramatization of the life of St. Therese of Lisieux, known more affectionately as the "Little Flower."

The film is not so much a textured spiritual portrait of the young French nun considered by Pope Pius X "the greatest saint of modern times" but a series of hagiographic tableaux that may be edifying to many Catholic viewers.

Set in Normandy in the late 19th century, the film opens with St. Therese — then Marie-Francoise Therese Martin, the youngest of five daughters — as a precocious toddler, who even at a young age exhibited an acute spiritual intuitiveness.

A brief prelude establishes the bourgeois Martins as a pious Catholic family. Soon, Therese's mother dies; it is a loss that would have a traumatizing effect on the future saint, prompting her to write in later years that "the earth seemed a sad place."

The movie then catches up with Therese as a melancholy 14-year-old. Still haunted by her mother's passing, and afflicted by an overly scrupulous conscience, Therese plunges towards a breakdown.

The mental collapse is hastened by the abandonment by her older sister and surrogate mother, who leaves home to join the Carmelite order; a farewell which only confirms Therese's despondent view that "life was continuing suffering and separation."

But a Christmas time conversion experience stirs Therese out of her malaise. She becomes consumed with an overwhelming zeal to dedicate her life to helping others.

Challenged by the rigors of cloistered life and inspired by Christ's counsel to be "like a child," Therese develops insights into a path of spirituality that she calls "the Little Way," a method of living that emphasizes great love over great deeds. Therese saw that God was everywhere, even in the quotidian details of life, and that joy can be found by undertaking each task — however menial — with charity and no expectation of reward.

The film gains emotional traction when Therese is diagnosed with late-stage tuberculosis. The disease would ultimately lead to her untimely death at age 24, but not before she endures months of agony — both physical and spiritual — in which her soul is "invaded by a thick darkness."

It is then that the film lowers its one-dimensional veil of sentimental piety and offers a more visceral glimpse of a flesh-and-blood Therese, with whom viewers of all faiths — or none — can identify. In the face of her suffering, Therese wrestles with all-too-human fears of "death and nothingness," but clings to her faith in God as if to a lifeline over an abyss of despair, as she movingly undergoes her own personal passion.

Financed totally by individual donations, the well-intentioned production is not without some flaws. Nevertheless, the beauty and power of Therese's inspirational life and words still shine through the film's production limitations.

Due to thematic elements involving parental death, and a criminal execution, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

Diocesan priest pleads in Salisbury case

Father Farwell receives 18 months, fine

SALISBURY — Father Richard Farwell, a priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, pleaded no contest to a charge of contributing to the delinquency of a minor in Rowan County Superior Court Nov. 2.

Father Farwell had been charged in 2002 with taking indecent liberties with a minor 19 years ago. The original charge, a felony, was reduced to a misdemeanor this week. He was sentenced to 18 months of probation and fined $1,200.

Father Farwell has not served in ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte since 1998.

In accord with the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," Father Farwell was removed from ministry when allegations of misconduct were made in 2002. Upon learning of the allegations, the Diocese of Charlotte placed him on administrative leave, removed his faculties as a priest and turned the matter over to civil authorities for investigation.

Removal of faculties prohibits a priest from celebrating Mass in public and from wearing clerical garb.

With the completion of the civil investigation, the diocesan Review Board will now review the matter. The board will make a confidential recommendation to Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who will then make a final determination regarding Father Farwell's status as a priest of the diocese.

Father Farwell was ordained in 1981. He served at parishes in Charlotte, Salisbury and Lincolnton and was working for the Florida-based Food for the Poor organization in 2002 when the charges were filed.

Much done to protect children, says archbishop abuse prevention policies contained in the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," adopted in 2002.

The review is called for in the charter and the bishops are expected to begin the review at their Nov. 15-18 general meeting and conclude it at their June 2005 meeting.

"A great deal has been done to protect our children and young people," the archbishop said. "My hope is that any modifications (of the charter) will be simply fine-tuning."

"It would be good for other organizations to look at what we have done and the recommendations we have made and to try to do likewise so that more children will be protected," he added.

Aspects of the charter he listed as helping improve child safety include:

— Regular independent audits of diocesan compliance with policies.

— Formation of a lay National Review Board to oversee compliance.

— Having a person available in each diocese to handle incoming complaints about child sex abuse.

— Background checks on church employees and volunteers who work with children.

Archbishop Flynn also strongly defended the "zero tolerance" policy, which says that any cleric who admits to or is proven to have sexually abused a child is permanently removed from ministry.

"For the sake of the church in the United States in this time of our history, I can't really think we can go in another direction," he said.

Although some aspects of the charter — such as audits and the National Review Board — are not required under church law, the bishops have a duty to apply the charter, he added.

Archbishop Flynn said rebuilding confidence in the church involves making the church's prevention policies better known publicly.

Among the issues that need "fine tuning" is ensuring equal protection for the young and for anyone who is accused of abuse but whose case has not been resolved, he said.

"People have a right to know if someone has been accused in a particular situation; and then, if that accusation is found to be false, equal amount of effort must be put into restoring that person's good name," he said.

Archbishop Flynn defended the need to continue the annual independent compliance audits, but said that there is room to make them more effective.

Another issue being considered by the bishops is whether the church should develop a national data bank of clerics and church employees who have not passed background checks, he said.

The charter also has expanded active lay participation in the church to the "very important area of protection for the young," he said.

He cited the National Review Board and the lay-staffed bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection that were set up to help dioceses comply with the charter. Both are mandated by the charter.

Diocesan requirements for reporting ministry-related sexual abuse of a minor

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.

2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.

3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Election 2004: Have you begun to live again?

Have you begun to live again?

Notice that I didn't ask if you have chosen the right or wrong candidate. Let me clear up the issue by stating that I am not engaging in any partisan politics. St. John calls Jesus the good shepherd, who takes care of his sheep. The main concern of the good shepherd is "that they may have life and have it to the full" (John 10:10). The most basic question is: "Are we really living to the full or half full or on empty?"

It is essential that we try to live in the present, that we not carry around unnecessary burdens from a yesterday that we will never live again or a tomorrow that is not guaranteed. Our God wants us to remember that He is "our today," not only our past and our future.

On the kitchen wall in the Ranch Guesthouse of St. Benedict's Monastery in Snowmass, Colo., there is a unique plaque, which is very meaningful:

I was regretting the past and fearing the future.

Suddenly God was speaking: "My name is 'I Am.'"

I waited. God continued, "When you live in past, with its mistakes and regrets, it is hard.

I am not there, my name is not 'I WAS.'

When you live in the future, with its problems and fears, it is hard.

I am not there. My name is not 'I WILL BE.'

When you live in this moment, it is not hard. I am here.

MY NAME IS 'I AM.'

ence in your life. You and God will.

Let me share two basic truths that I hope will help us begin to live again. Sometime, somehow, somewhere along the way we lose our song, our enthusiasm for life and even worse, we feel that we never really lived before. Then Jesus points the way.

The first truth is simply this: life is meant to be lived, even the ordinary, uneventful and undramatic moments.

One of the great tragedies of the human experience is that many people spend the better part of their lives getting ready to live them. Fathers wait until other obligations are less demanding to become acquainted with their children. Mothers sincerely intend to spend more time with their daughters. Husbands and wives plan to be kinder and more understanding with each other.

When in the world are we going to begin? This is our time. What on earth are we waiting for? When we are paralyzed by tragedy, overcome by obstacles, discouraged by unfulfilled dreams, devastated by loss, threatened

Pope, at audience, discusses Revelation canticle about Christ's death

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II gathered inspiration from the Liturgy of the Hours' evening prayer to concentrate on the death of Christ and how it had turned Christians into "a kingdom of priests."

During his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square Nov. 3, the pope recalled how Christ's death is presented as the slaying of the lamb in a canticle from the Book of Revelation. The canticle is included in the evening prayer.

The canticle "concentrates in a particular way on Christ, the lamb, who has been slain but now reigns glorious. In him God's eternal project has been fulfilled," said the English summary of the pope's talk.

Christ, the summary read, "has freed us from evil and made us into a kingdom of priests."

Christians belong to a "community of God's children to which all people are called," it said.

The pope read only part of his talk in Italian.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

In the talk, he noted that the evening prayer uses the canticle from the Book of Revelation which develops the image of "a lamb that seemed to have been slain" and again where "the four living creatures and the 24 elders fell down before the lamb."

The pope said that at the center of this "chorus of praise" is Christ, "with his work of redemption." This canticle brings "the simplicity and intensity of a chorus of praise," he said.

The pope appeared alert and relatively strong, but appeared at times to make a great effort to continue talking. He touched, blessed and sometimes had a few words for the many people who stopped and knelt before him following the audience.

by intimidating circumstances, or even betrayed and wounded by the selfishness of someone close to us, then it's time to begin to live again.

The second truth is: life is designed to have meaning. At Callaway Gardens, Ga., the Cecil B. Day family has funded a butterfly exhibit and research center. If you go, you will be introduced to the moth with no mouth. It is a species of caterpillar that lays eggs and then changes into a moth that has no digestive system, no way of taking food, so it starves to death in a matter of hours. Once it has fulfilled its reproductive function, it dies.

God did not make human beings like that. We are more than a moth. Meaning in life is not a destination, but a journey here and now.

There is a legend that goes as follows: The birds were gathered together one day, many years ago, complaining that they had been burdened with wings. These seemingly useless appendages were heavy, bulky and always got in the way. None of the other animals had been asked to bear them.

How surprised they were to learn that their wings were blessings to allow them to soar above the earth and see things none of the other animals would ever see. They had misunderstood a gift to be a burden. The challenge of living today as the first day of our lives will make our yesterdays a learning experience and our tomorrows full of hope.

Life is a song. Sing it today!

The perfect church

People are most critical when least involved

"HE WHO HAS AN EAR, LET HIM HEAR WHAT THE SPIRIT SAYS TO THE CHURCHES." REVELATION 3:22. READ REVELATION 2 AND 3.

Contradictions. You would like to take courses in theology, but you avoid going to Mass on Sunday. You only go to church for the baby's dedication, the wedding, the funeral or maybe you work on every church committee you can. You speak of the pastor's new car or you boast of how important your pastor is when you see him in the news. You resent the fact that no one helped that family when they got evicted, or you bought a new outfit to celebrate the parish anniversary program.

We love the church; we hate the church. We get so angry when we think of what's wrong; and yet, we fail to realize how important our love, conviction and forgiveness is for Christ's body of believers.

Some of us seek the perfect church in order to find a place of worship. It is a convenient rationale for avoiding personal commitment and spiritual warfare. We are often most critical when we are least involved. It is easy to criticize fiscal policies when we give less at the church than we do at the restaurant after service.

On the other hand, if we tithe and sacrificially give, we can also criticize with ease, when we fail to have the control that we think we buy.

Jesus had some concerns about the church as well. However, he took it to a whole new level. He realized what was at stake. That is where he left his power and that is where he left the work of transforming lives, claiming eternal destinies and igniting the world with hope. When Jesus spoke of the church, he meant us believers, whether we realize it or not.

He expects a lot from us, but he gave us a lot to work with.

Jesus loved the church. He gave himself for it. Don't be fooled. The gates of hell will not prevail against God's church. Jesus is the head of the church and every believer has an important role. You are a part of his great plan. If you would like to be a member of the perfect church, stand ready for the return of Jesus. Prepare yourself with love and forgiveness. Be directed by the Holy Spirit. Repent.

That means that you stop doing what you know is wrong. Do what God commands and then watch God. Husbands will come home. Seekers will come forth. Disease, brokenness and evil will

Stewardship Sunday — a time to respond to God's generosity

During my first year as your bishop, I have been privileged to visit more than half of the parishes and missions in the diocese. In each location, I received a warm and hospitable welcome — a true indication that our people embrace stewardship as a way of life.

The wonderful Masses and receptions held in the parishes were the result of countless hours of time and talent donated by many devoted stewards. The young people I have confirmed reflect the dedication of teachers and parents who have spent years helping to form their faith.

I see tremendous growth in the diocese as evidenced by new facilities to accommodate the ever-increasing needs of our parishes. I recognize the financial commitments of parishioners who give generously of their treasure to help build the Kingdom of God in their parishes and the diocese. I have found hundreds of generous stewards who give the first fruits of their time, talent and treasure in service to others.

This year, the diocese celebrates the 16th annual Stewardship Awareness Sunday on Nov. 14. This affords each of us an opportunity to look at our own stewardship of our time, talent and treasure; of our vocations, relationships and environment; and of the Catholic faith that we cherish.

These are all gifts from Almighty God, given for our use during the short time we are here on earth. Our readings for the end of the liturgical season remind us that some day we will all be held accountable for our stewardship of these gifts.

Many parishes use this weekend as a time for renewal of parishioners' stewardship commitments. Other parishes have their renewal efforts earlier in the fall or in the spring. This weekend provides an opportunity to

From the Bishop

MOST REV.
PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF

focus on the meaning of stewardship in each of our lives, in the life of our parishes, and the Church.

I encourage you to take some time today to reflect on your own gifts of time, talent and treasure and give prayerful thought as to how you can best respond to God's generosity. Perhaps it might mean making a concerted effort to improve your prayer life, giving God the first fruits of your time. It could involve taking an inventory of your talents and finding ways to use those talents in service to God through your parish, the diocese or your community. It may mean taking another step to give a proportionate amount of your financial resources in support of your parish, the diocese or other charities.

We all need to ask ourselves what kind of stewards we are of our beloved Catholic faith and of the natural resources God has provided the world in which we live.

Through Baptism we are called to be faithful disciples of Jesus Christ. We must make a conscious decision to follow His way — a way of life that embraces stewardship.

Letters to the Editor

Stem-cell story challenges faithful

I would like to thank you for the well-rounded report in the piece, "Stem cell experts, activists exhort Catholics to understand issues" (Oct. 15).

Four qualities made this an excellent template for future articles of this nature: scientific fact, opposing sides, Catholic Church teaching and our bishop's statement. I find this type of educational publishing to be one of the best approaches to challenging and guiding the consciences of the Catholic faithful.

Moral clarity lesson overdue

I want to commend Father Matthew Buettner's column ("Moral clarity in an election year," Oct. 22). If we had this clarity 31 years ago, maybe 44 million people would be enjoying life today. And our country would not be heading for an immoral abyss.

Hopefully, it is not too late for a U-turn.

May God bless you, Father Buettner, and also the United States of America.

Making Jesus a superstar

Has Hollywood learned anything from the runaway success of the Mel Gibson film, "The Passion of the Christ?" Can Christians expect to see more films that depict the life of Jesus?

"The Passion" earned more than $370 million, a figure that tells movie moguls that there are a lot of people who are willing to fork over $8 to see a film based on Scripture. The original "Shrek" earned only $267 million and it generated a sequel, so why not a "Passion" sequel? It could be called "The Resurrection" or even "The Nativity." We Catholics know that there is no shortage of excellent Scripture based stories.

Unfortunately the answers to those questions from Tinseltown insider Charlie Carner are, "no," Hollywood hasn't really learned anything from Gibson's success and "no," don't expect to see a surge in movies about Jesus.

Carner is a rarity among filmmakers — he is devout about his Catholic faith. A successful filmmaker, Carner spoke recently to a group of diocesan communication directors at the annual conference of the Academy for Catholic Communication Arts Professionals in Los Angeles. Carner looks the part of a filmmaker. He sports the obligatory southern California tan, his clothes are basic black and he wears three silver necklaces. His best-known film, "Judas," appeared on the ABC television network earlier this year.

Carner's faith based approach to film work is part of a remarkable story of conversion. On Easter Sunday 1991, an accident at a water park left him temporarily paralyzed from the neck down. Even though his paralysis was temporary, he was in therapy for a year.

Carner describes it as a wake up call from God. As soon as he was able to drive a car again, he drove straight to his wife's Catholic church and enrolled in the RCIA class. On Easter Sunday 1992, he was received into the Catholic Church.

Carner is blunt in describing the Hollywood film community as including pagans who are openly hostile to Christianity. "If a miracle happens in a movie, they would rather ascribe it to a crystal ball," said Carner.

Most filmmakers, he said, are part of an out of touch elite who do not pray and don't understand people who do.

When "The Passion" became a megahit — as the 51st highest grossing film of all time — Carner felt that Gibson's faith inspired vision would create a surge in demand for well-made, Scripture-based films. Instead, he said the studios viewed "The Passion" as "a one-off fluke."

Sadly, he said there has been no stampede by writers and directors seeking a green light for a Scripture-based story that can be made into a movie.

Fortunately, Carner puts his faith in his films. In an interview about the movie "Judas," Carner said, "I try to bring my faith to the work in whatever way that I can. In a film like 'Judas' it permeates the whole thing. In other films it is not as upfront, but it's always there. It's just how I see the world, and so it's how I do my work."

A few blocks from the hotel where Carner spoke is the Hollywood Walk of Fame, a mile-long shrine that is Los Angeles' best known tourist attraction. Embedded into the brass and terrazzo stars in the sidewalk are the names of the people who have created the fantasies of the Hollywood dream machine.

In an odd twist, these tributes are located in what is probably the sleaziest area of Los Angeles. Tattoo parlors and adult-oriented businesses line both sides of the street along the walk. Charlie Carner doesn't have a star in the Walk of Fame and perhaps he never will. But he is in good company among the excluded. Mel Gibson's name isn't on the walk, and neither is that of Jesus Christ, Superstar.

St. Joseph of the Hills Church serves vibrant, small community

St. Joseph of the Hills Church in Eden has served Catholics in Rockingham County since 1939.

EDEN — The little church dedicated in 1939 as Joseph of the Hills Church has seen its surroundings transform over the years.

The Mansfield family, originally from Illinois, relocated to Leaksville, N.C. in 1917 when Joe Mansfield's textile company expanded to the western North Carolina Piedmont. The Mansfields were devout Catholics who for nearly 20 years traveled to Greensboro or Danville, Va., to attend Mass.

Beginning in the fall of 1935, priests from Greensboro and Burlington began celebrating Mass in Leaksville-area homes. In 1938, construction of a church began just outside Leaksville in nearby Eden.

St. Joseph of the Hills Church was dedicated on New Year's Day, 1939.

The church's stained-glass windows were donated by several American cardinals, archbishops and bishops. The congregation illustrated the true universal spirit of the Catholic Church in that many of the Catholic families at the dedication represented a variety of ethnic and geographical backgrounds.

A rectory was built in 1940, and in June of that year St. Joseph of the Hills Church was designated a parish, with Father James Noonan becoming the first resident Catholic pastor in Rockingham County.

The textile mill industry brought out-of-state Catholics to the area over the years, although church membership — numbering 51 in 1943 — grew slowly. Catholics from nearby Reidsville, as well as several converts, boosted the growth of the faith in the area as well.

By the end of the 1950s, parish growth has resulted in an expansion: a parish hall was built in honor of former pastor Msgr. Arthur Freeman. Also, in 1962, the Catholic population in Reidsville had grown to such a number that a church being built there was warranted.

Industrial expansion during the 1960s, '70s and '80s continued to bring Catholics into the region. Over time, the St. Joseph of the Hills Church congregation developed a number of parish programs to assist in pastoral and administrative functioning.

In 1985, a larger parish hall was built to provide an assembly area and classrooms.

In addition to the parish council, finance council, faith formation program, family life commission, Knights of Columbus, Ladies Guild and Altar Society, parishioners also devote time to community projects. The Cancer Society, hospice, The Council on Aging, Salvation Army, Migrant Ministry and Cooperative Christian Ministries all receive assistance from parishioners of St. Joseph of the Hills Church.

While the Reidsville church, Holy Infant, was built in 1962 to serve the influx of Rockingham County Catholics, St. Joseph of the Hills Church continues to reach out to the faithful in Eden, Madison and Mayodan, as well as those in Stokesdale in Guilford County and all of Stokes County. Catholics in Henry County, Va., worship in Eden, as well.

Mercy Sister Bernadette McNamara served as the parish's pastoral administrator from July 1996 to July 2001, while Father Joseph Valentine, pastoral administrator of Holy Infant Church in Reidsville, and his successors, then-Father Peter J. Jugis, Father John Putnam, Father Christopher Davis and Franciscan Father Louis Canino, served as sacramental ministers for the St. Joseph of the Hills Church congregation.

Since July 2001, Father Thomas Selvaraj, a native of India, has served as the parish's full-time pastor.

To serve the spiritual and cultural needs of the ever-increasing Hispanic population, a Hispanic ministry was inaugurated on March 8, 2003. Retired diocesan priest Father Joseph Waters assists in this ministry.

The Knights of Columbus and the Ladies Guild work earnestly to increase the membership in their respective organizations. The guild also has improved the landscaping of the campus of the 66-year-old church, making it more welcoming.

Father Selvaraj is breaking new ground by joining the "Weekly Lectionary Discussion Group," which consists of area pastors of all denominations.

St. Joseph of the Hills Church continues to serve and to evangelize the multicultural population of the Rockingham County.

PRAYING FOR PEACE

Samah Khoury, 23, prays with her nieces, Lur and Yasmin, during Mass at Holy Family Catholic Church in Ramallah, West Bank, Nov. 7. With the possibility of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's death, some Catholics in the West Bank are concerned that extremist Islamic groups might gain strength.

As Arafat ailed, some Catholics feared extremists would gain strength

RAMALLAH, West Bank (CNS) — Amid continuing speculations over Palestinian National Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's deteriorating health, some Catholics expressed fear extremist Islamic groups would gain strength after he dies.

At Ramallah's Holy Family Catholic Church, Father Ibrahim Hijazin acknowledged that one of the main concerns of Christians at the moment is how Islamic groups will react in the face of a power vacuum within the Palestinian National Authority.

"There is this fear for the future as Christians — but there is that fear in Iraq, in Jordan — everywhere in the Arab world," Father Hijazin said Nov. 7.

"What will be after Arafat? Some fear there will be infiltration (of radical Islamic forces). They are fearing there will be some problems (within) the Palestinian Authority which will reflect itself ... especially (on) the Christians," said Father Hijazin.

The Arab Muslim world connects local Christians to what they perceive as the "Christian countries" of the United States and Britain acting in Afghanistan and Iraq, he said.

Neveen Halteh, 20, a marketing student at Jerusalem's Al-Quds University and member of Holy Family Church, was not optimistic about change after Arafat.

"They hate us. I am afraid we will not have peace," she said. "Arafat was keeping everything under control, but now he will be gone, and we don't know what will happen without him."

"Arafat was good with the Christians; maybe those after him will be too, but we can't be sure, so there is fear," said Shadi Hindaileh, a 25-year-old civil engineer and member of Holy Family Church.

"Our good relations are not because of Arafat," said Bernard Sabella, a Catholic and sociology professor at Catholic-run Bethlehem University. "He may have been instrumental in promoting Christian-Muslim relations, but traditionally our experience as Christians living in Muslim lands has been excellent."

Arafat, 75, was flown from Ramallah to a Paris hospital for treatment of an undisclosed blood disorder Oct. 29. After brief reports that his health was improving, it was announced that he had fallen into a coma Nov. 3. He has been on life support since then, and the Palestinian media and spokesmen have been issuing conflicting reports about his condition; at one point, his death was announced.

Arafat, who retains the titles of president of the self-declared Palestinian state and chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, was able to keep in check the political aspirations of Islamic extremist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

He also was able to distance himself from the charges of corruption that surrounded his deputies and certain Palestinian National Authority officials, thus allowing him to be viewed as a symbol of unity for the Palestinian people.

Cardinal says Catholics must learn about Judaism to know faith

ROME (CNS) — Catholics cannot know their faith, nor even fully understand the Mass, without learning about Judaism, the faith of Jesus and his disciples, said retired Cardinal Carlo Maria Martini of Milan.

The cardinal, a biblical scholar who now lives part of the year in Jerusalem, also urged Catholics to pray for peace in the Middle East.

"When there is peace in Jerusalem, there will be peace on earth," the cardinal said at the Nov. 4 conference "Approaches to a Christian Theology of Judaism," sponsored by the Cardinal Bea Center for Jewish Studies at Rome's Gregorian University.

In the Christian-Jewish dialogue, Cardinal Martini said, "that which is at stake touches all Christians," not only in their obligation to promote friendly relations with others, but to understand and appreciate the faith of Jesus, the disciples and the early Christian communities.

The cardinal said that, especially during the Year of the Eucharist Catholics, should learn about the Jewish prayers, blessings and rituals that shaped Jesus' last Passover meal with his disciples and the development of the Mass itself.

"It is vital for the church not only to understand the ancient covenant (between God and the Jewish people), which has endured for centuries in order to launch a fruitful dialogue, but also to deepen our own understanding of who we are as the church," he said.

"It is not enough to be 'anti' anti-Semitism," he said. "We need to build friendships, recognizing our differences, but not allowing them to lead to conflict."

He also said Christians and Jews must work together on concrete projects of charity, justice and peace, creating mutual trust and fulfilling their religious obligation "to give witness to God's love for humanity."

Vatican official to Hindus: Feasts encourage action for children

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Celebrating religious feasts and seeing the joy they bring to children should encourage adults to take concrete action on behalf of the other children in the world who have nothing to celebrate, a Vatican official said in a message to Hindus.

In offering his best wishes to Hindus preparing to celebrate Diwali, a five-day feast beginning Nov. 12, Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, asked for concrete ideas for Hindu-Catholic projects to help suffering children.

The two communities, he said, should “focus our attention on the evils in our society that afflict children: forced labor, forced conscription, the breakdown of the family, trafficking in organs and persons, sexual abuse, forced prostitution, AIDS, the sale and use of drugs, etc.”

“What have children done to merit such suffering?” he asked.

Archbishop Fitzgerald said many Hindu and Christian communities already work together to assist children, “but we could and should do more, as the problem is serious, indeed it is tragic.”

Diwali, also known as the “festival of lights,” is one of the oldest and most important feasts in the Hindu religion. It celebrates the victory of light over darkness and of good over evil.

“Indeed, no celebration truly deserves this name unless a central place is given to children, the more so since the festive spirit requires everyone to acquire a childlike heart,” he said.

Archbishop Fitzgerald encouraged Hindus to enjoy their celebration of Diwali, but to do so keeping in mind the plight of suffering children “in your own neighborhood, in your town, in society in general and, more broadly, throughout the whole world.”

Family and friends are all invited for food and fellowship. Transportation is available for those needing rides. Meal will be delivered to those who cannot attend. Call the church office at (704) 867-6212 for details.

Pope encourages scientists to value the sharing of knowledge

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II said scientific researchers always should value the sharing of knowledge over competition and financial gain.

He spoke Nov. 8 to members of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, who were meeting in a plenary session devoted to the theme of science and creativity.

The pope said that, in a sense, scientists are called to be “co-creators” with God as they use their knowledge and skill to shape the cosmos in harmony with a divine plan.

Such creativity must be exercised responsibly, he said, for it “demands respect for the natural order and, above all, for the nature of each human being.”

Increasingly, the pope said, scientific progress is seen as the answer to modern problems, many of which have planetary repercussions. As a result, scientists are asked to place their creativity more at the service of the human family, he said.

“If scientific creativity is to benefit authentic human progress, it must remain detached from every form of financial or ideological conditioning, so that it can be devoted solely to the dispassionate search for truth and the disinterested service of humanity,” he said.

He told the scientists that the paths of discovery “are always paths toward truth.”

“And every seeker after truth, whether aware of it or not, is following a path which ultimately leads to God, who is truth itself,” he said.

The memorial, along with a bronze replica of Michelangelo's "Pieta," is in a section that includes the graves of 45 people who perished in the attacks. Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., dedicated the new memorial following an All Souls' Day Mass Nov. 2.

No Liturgy changes due to flu

A recent announcement from the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops states “the need for the introduction of widespread liturgical adaptations for the prevention of the transmission of influenza in the dioceses of the United States of America is not evident at this time.”

The Precious Blood can continue to be offered in a common cup and parishioners are free to offer one another a handshake during the “Sign of Peace.” But the conference also points out that good hygiene, especially thorough hand washing, should always be practiced, especially by eucharistic ministers.

The conference says “priests, deacons, and extraordinary ministers of Holy Communion should be especially reminded of the need to practice good hygiene. Ministers of Holy Communion should be encouraged to wash their hands before Mass begins, or even to use an alcohol based anti-bacterial solution before and after distributing Holy Communion. They should instruct people who feel ill not to receive from the cup.”

BELMONT — High school youth ministry members from Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont provided a "spooktacular" Halloween for UNICEF (United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund) by "trick-or-treating" in Belmont and collecting $250 for the organization Oct. 31.

The United Nations established UNICEF in December 1946 to meet the emergency needs of children in post-war Europe and China. In 1950, its mandate was broadened to address the long-term needs of children and women in developing countries. UNICEF became a permanent part of the U.N. system in 1953 when its name was shorted to the United Nations Children's Fund; however, it retained its original acronym.

SHAPING THE FUTURE

World Community Day explores ways to facilitate peace, action

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — Catholic women recently joined other Christian women to reaffirm their work for peace.

"We are a people called to a holy mission — to be instruments of peace," said Rev. Alice Johnson Curl, associate pastor of St. Stephen's Lutheran Church. "This is not a call to sit on the sidelines. This is a summons to action."

Rev. Curl spoke at the World Community Day service sponsored by the Hickory chapter of Church Women United. More than 50 people attended the annual service, this year themed "In Faith, Women Shape the Future for Peace," held at Bethany Lutheran Church in Hickory Nov. 5.

Founded in 1941, Church Women United is a Christian women's movement representing 25 million Protestant, Roman Catholic, Orthodox and other Christian women. Coming from more than 15 Hickory-area churches, including St. Aloysius Catholic Church, women came together to prepare the World Community Day and annual World Day of Prayer services.

Carole Marmorato, a parishioner of St. Aloysius Church, heads the planning committee for the services.

"Shape, mold, form, have an effect on — these words are action verbs," said Rev. Curl. "They have in them a feel of power."

Rev. Curl encouraged those present to work for peace by keeping informed, supporting organizations that look for peaceful solutions, volunteering at schools, writing to government officials and being a role model for peace in their homes.

"Live peace. Listen. Be kind and supportive," she said.

During the service, participants also heard a dramatic interpretation of the biblical story of Hagar and her son Ishmael, read by Alice Spuller of Corinth Reformed United Church of Christ.

Several women took turns reading peace quotes, such as one from Mother Teresa: "Lead me from death to life, from lies to truth. Lead me from despair to hope, from fear to trust. Lead me from hatred to love, from war to peace. Let peace fill our hearts, our world, our universe ... peace, peace, peace."

At the start of the service, a procession of women carried symbols of peace to be laid upon the altar — a Bible, a Torah, paper cranes and a statue of praying hands. Participants were given paper doves on which to write about a situation that was causing them unrest. They then exchanged the papers with someone nearby and agreed to pray for each other.

A reception prepared by members of the participating churches followed the worship service.

Church Women United is recognized as a U.N. non-governmental organization and is the official U.S. committee for the World Day of Prayer, an international celebration that seeks to honor each country's unique prayers, stories and songs. The next World Day of Prayer will be held March 4, 2005.

The organization recently adopted a priority of "Strengthening Families Worldwide in the 21st Century." In conjunction with that theme, participants in Hickory brought donations of supplies needed by Hickory's Family Guidance Center, which offers counseling services for individuals and families.

Parishioners share annual feast with needy

Blanche and Al Triunfo and Ann Ketchum, the church secretary, arrived at the parish hall at 8:30 a.m. to put 40 pounds of pork loin in the oven. The Triunfos then brought in the hot sliced pork, while others set up the tables and decorated them with evergreen sprigs, miniature chocolate bars and tea lights in ribbon-bedecked stemmed glasses.

"I'm so busy with what I do that I don't get to meet a lot of people," said Terri Van Dyck, a professional porcelain artist. "Everybody needs a little 'TLC,' a little love."

St. Margaret, who was queen of Scotland 1070-1093, gave plenty of tender loving care to those she met. She frequently fed the hungry, and she and her husband, King Malcolm, daily helped those in need. One account says that they "waited on Christ in the person of his poor."

A picture in St. Margaret of Scotland Church's vestibule shows Margaret, one arm around one of her own eight children, spoon-feeding an orphan.

At the Nov. 7 dinner, some 70 St. Margaret of Scotland parishioners and about 60 Open Door clients filled the dining room, mingling at the tables. The facility averages 50 people for lunch daily.

Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle, St. Margaret of Scotland Church's pastor, spoke about the reason for the special dinner and Margaret's love of gathering people together to dine. All, no matter where they come from or who they are, are gathered in Christ this night at the Open Door, he said.

"I just thought it was great," Ketchum said. "What really impressed me was the way the parishioners intermingled (with the clients). With St. Margaret of Scotland being our patron saint, I hope we do it again next year."

As parishioner Don White played dinner music on the piano, Marie Bartholomew, Mary Ann Yurko, Shirley Hillyer and Father Doyle joined others to serve the food.

"It was terrific, the service was great," said Donnie Davis, a regular at Open Door lunches.

"It was a good idea. I always enjoy getting together," said parishioner David Schumm. "You get to know a few more people each time. If you go and meet even one person you can be friendly with, it's a good idea. I thought it was a great success."

"It was a beautiful blend of Christian love, and it felt so natural the way the church family and the clients were able to mingle," said Perry Hines, who, with wife JoAnn, directs Open Door Ministries. "They were really able to click. We were one; there were no distinctions. It was really, really beautiful."

ELECTION ROUNDUP

After the election: soothing bitterness, analyzing votes and the need — the desperate need — for unity, for finding common ground and coming together. Today, I hope we can begin the healing.”

Later in the day in a speech in Washington, Bush pledged to seek the support of Kerry's voters during his second term.

“America has spoken, and I'm humbled by the trust and the confidence of my fellow citizens,” he said. “With that trust comes a duty to serve all Americans. And I will do my best to fulfill that duty every day as your president.”

Calling for solidarity

Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles was quick to offer his congratulations to Bush after Kerry conceded to the president the day after the election.

“The partisan rhetoric of the campaign must now give way to a genuine commitment to bipartisanship and to a partnership for the common good,” the cardinal said in a statement.

He said all Americans must work together with the administration and Congress to strengthen the nation's moral principles, promote human dignity, nurture the stability of families and assist those who are hungry, lack health care or need jobs.

Philadelphia Cardinal Justin Rigali issued a statement congratulating Bush and expressed his best wishes to Kerry.

But he also called on Americans “to come together to support the president as he leads the United States during the next four years.”

“As citizens we may differ in our views but agree that we want what is truly best for each other, for our country and for the world,” Cardinal Rigali said.

He said he and his brother bishops “will strive to work with the president as he deals with difficult issues facing our nation.”

Meanwhile, even before the final vote tallies were in, the campaigns, pollsters and social scientists were deconstructing the results for clues about why people voted the way they did.

The Catholic vote

Despite extensive attention to the role of religion in the lives of the presidential candidates this year — particularly criticism of Kerry from within his own Catholic Church — exit polls showed Catholics apparently voted much the same as the overall population.

Nationwide, about 51 percent of voters chose Bush, compared to 48 percent who voted for Kerry. Among all Catholics, who make up 27 percent of the electorate, Bush got 52 percent of the vote compared to 47 percent for Kerry.

An analysis by John Green, head of the Bliss Institute for Applied Politics at the University of Akron in Ohio, and Steven Waldman, founder of the online magazine Beliefnet, found that Catholics in the battleground states of Florida and Ohio turned out more strongly for Bush than for Kerry.

In Ohio, the analysis found that 65 percent of Catholics who attend church weekly voted for Bush and 35 percent of them voted for Kerry. Nationwide, 56 percent of Catholics who said they go to church weekly voted for Bush, compared to 43 percent for Kerry.

Green and Waldman said 58 percent of voters nationwide from all faiths who attend church once a week voted for Bush. Those who attend church less frequently were more likely to vote for Kerry.

The exit poll study also reported high turnout particularly for Bush among what they defined as white evangelical or born-again Christians. They constitute 23 percent of the electorate, and 78 percent voted for Bush while 21 percent voted for Kerry.

Protestants — including both evangelicals and members of mainline denominations — make up 54 percent of the electorate; 59 percent of them voted for Bush, compared to 40 percent for Kerry.

Defining moment

Years from now, historians might point to a specific moment in the 2004 campaign when the tide turned in favor of Bush over Kerry.

It was early July, two weeks before the Democratic convention, and Bush was speaking out in favor of the Federal Marriage Amendment, which would amend the U.S. Constitution to define marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

“Because families pass along values and shape character, traditional marriage is also critical to the health of society,” Bush said in his July 10 national radio address. “Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them. And changing the definition of traditional marriage will undermine the family structure.”

Some had warned that it was unwise for Bush to put such emphasis on what they viewed as a divisive social policy when voters cared more about Iraq, the war on terrorism and the economy.

“Our analysis of the swing voters shows that they are concerned about Iraq and about the economy, and I don't think they are likely to be swayed, or have strong feelings, about a constitutional amendment,” Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, told The New York Times back in July.

“If anything, they may see it as putting the emphasis on the wrong place when the country has other problems,” said Kohut.

But 22 percent of all voters across the United States picked “moral values” as the most important issue facing the nation, followed by the economy and jobs (20 percent) and the war on terrorism (19 percent). Eighty percent of those who saw moral values as the most important issue voted for Bush, according to post-election data released by the National Election Pool.

Eleven state ballots included measures similar to the Federal Marriage Amendment, revising state constitutions to limit marriage to its traditional definition. The measure was approved in all 11 states, including Ohio, where a Bush win secured his victory in the Electoral College, and eight other states won by Bush.

down the aisle to a second term,” said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council.

Kerry said during the campaign that he favored restricting marriage to heterosexual couples, but opposed achieving that through the constitutional amendment process.

Catholic leaders nationally and in the states looking at the issue this year had called nearly unanimously for approval of the federal and state amendments.

Only Oregon and Michigan voters approved the amendment to ban same-sex marriage but chose Kerry over Bush. In each of those states, according to the National Election Pool data, voters picked something other than moral values as the most important election issue. For Oregonians it was the war in Iraq, and for those in Michigan, it was the issue of the economy and jobs.

Transcending boundaries

At a post-election discussion Nov. 4, John Kenneth White, politics professor and director of the Life Cycle Institute at The Catholic University of America, said that in some ways the Massachusetts Supreme Court handed Bush's campaign the issue it needed to succeed in this election.

The court's decision gave Republican strategists and activists an issue that energized people to come out to vote to pass the marriage initiatives and also support Bush, he said.

Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, said the marriage initiatives brought Bush “a critical bump in support among core Democratic voting groups” that favored the amendment, including African-Americans, Catholics and women.

“Among African-American voters in Ohio alone ... President Bush nearly doubled his support over the 2000 election, from 9 (percent) to 16 percent,” Daniels said.

Bush “also improved his support among Catholics and women by 5 percent,” he added. “Indeed, America demonstrated broad-based strength and momentum for our Federal Marriage Amendment — strength and momentum that transcends all racial, cultural and religious boundary lines.”

tion. Since 1976, Habitat has built more than 175,000 houses. Now at work in 100 countries, Habitat builds a house every 26 minutes. By 2005, Habitat houses will be sheltering 1 million people.

In Charlotte, Habitat houses now provide shelter for more than 500 families. St. Matthew Church is one of many area churches involved in building houses through Habitat for Humanity.

On Nov. 6, Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church, dedicated the future home of Ylueng Rcom and his family. The small house is one of 34 houses built by Habitat for Humanity in the Rainbow Ridge development of Matthews.

So far, St. Matthew parishioners have sponsored three Habitat houses. More than 194 volunteers contributed 2,266 hours to build the Rcom house.

"We as a community feel Habitat for Humanity is very important as an outreach project," said Msgr. McSweeney. "We benefit as much as the recipients."

St. Matthew Church's participation with Habitat for Humanity projects comes out of the financial and pastoral council's missions and is included in its three-year parish plan.

"This community outreach program would not have been possible without Msgr. McSweeney's financial commitment for this project," said Bob Desch, publicity coordinator for St. Matthew Church's Habitat for Humanity sponsorship committee.

"We would not have been able to complete the project without the skilled volunteers who donated their time to provide direction or to complete those aspects of the project requiring their specific talents," he said.

Habitat houses are purchased by the homeowner families. Three factors make the houses affordable to low-income people worldwide: houses are sold at no profit, with no interest charged on the mortgage; homeowners and volunteers build the houses under trained supervision; and individuals, corporations, faith groups and others provide financial support.

Homeowner families are chosen according to their need, their ability to repay the mortgage and their willingness to work in partnership with Habitat. Habitat for Humanity does not discriminate according to race, religion or ethnic group.

Volunteer builders install framing, roof decking, insulation, drywall, exterior siding and paint. Professional subcontractors are hired to complete heating, air conditioning and electrical work, to pour concrete and lay floor covering.

Each house takes approximately 13 weeks to complete, with the majority of work being performed on Saturdays by volunteer work crews.

"Our work with Habitat for Humanity continues the themes of social justice and good stewardship through sharing our treasures of time, talent and treasure," said Msgr. McSweeney.

Father Edward Sheridan, pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, joins members of the parish's Health Team Ministry at Charlotte Community Health Clinic Oct. 21. The team of volunteers will help staff the clinic to provide medical care to low-income, uninsured adults in Mecklenburg County.

new working relationship, part of a pilot program involving parish volunteers, was celebrated during a gathering at the clinic Oct. 21.

"We needed people in the community who wanted to help make a difference, so we went to St. Gabriel Church," said Dr. Ophelia Garmon-Brown, the clinic's medical director.

During the gathering, Father Edward Sheridan, pastor, blessed the partnership through prayer and Dr. Paul O'Bar, St. Gabriel Church's health ministries coordinator, formally recognized the parish volunteers serving on the "Health Ministry Team."

"This is a chance for us to do mission work without leaving town," said O'Bar. "A lot of people will volunteer if you give them something to do."

The clinic, a nonprofit organization established in 2000, provides free medical care, assistance with medications and health care education to low-income, uninsured adult residents in Mecklenburg County. Outside of a small administrative staff — four full-time and three part-time — the clinic on Eastway Drive relies on volunteers willing to donate their time and abilities without pay.

Volunteers from St. Gabriel Church staff the clinic one day a week to provide a broad range of medical services. They will serve as physicians, nurses, office support and interpreters for non-English-speaking patients.

"We'll be seeing patients as we would in any medical office," said Dr. John Davenport, a member of the parish's Health Ministry Team.

"Their team staffs the clinic for the whole night," said Ruth Huey, the clinic's nurse manager and member of the diocesan Mecklenburg Area Task Force on Aging. "They're very reliable, have a real positive attitude and bring that spirit of our ministry to our clinic and our patients."

"Part of our purpose (as Catholics) is to reach out and help people in need," said Father Sheridan. "Those using this clinic are in need for a lot of reasons."

Davenport said the clinic sees patients without regard to insurance or legal status.

"They don't have to provide citizenship," he said. "They're just people who need quality health care."

"I see a strong need in the community," said Enrique Escobar, a St. Gabriel parishioner serving as a translator for Spanish-speaking patients. "Many people have no insurance. We need to help the community."

"I like to help, and this is a way of giving something back," he said.

According to information supplied by the clinic, there are approximately 90,000-100,000 uninsured people in Mecklenburg County. Due to contributions through Presbyterian Hospital, United Way of the Central Carolinas, individuals and church donations, the clinic is able to meet the demand for medical care.

Church was willing to be a pilot project to see if we can do a ministry this way," said Nancy Hudson, the clinic's executive director.

The volunteers from St. Gabriel Church allowed the clinic to expand to seeing patients by appointment only on Tuesday and Thursdays.

Hudson hopes that by having volunteers from St. Gabriel Church staff the clinic, other area churches will be willing to supply volunteer help on other nights.

"It's wonderful to say that we have St. Gabriel Church. It sets a precedent in the community," said Hudson. "When we add a new group, we'll add new clinics (on other days)."

The clinic is looking for volunteers available as physicians, nurses, certified medical assistants, pharmacists, phlebotomists, dieticians and social workers, among others. But volunteers without medical training are welcome as well.

"There's something for everyone — clerical work, answering the phone, translating," said O'Bar. "Everyone will have something to contribute."

Breaking the cycle of poverty

CCHD collection aids local, national programs

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — America's 51st state has a population of 34 million people — nearly equal to that of California, the most populous. Its residents live in the slums of New York City and Baltimore, the mountains of North Carolina and West Virginia, and the desert plains of New Mexico and Arizona.

Residents of this 51st state live in "Poverty USA" — as it is called by the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD).

Nine million Poverty USA residents are employed, and 2.6 million of those hold full-time jobs. The United States federal government sets the poverty annual income level at $18,392 for a family of four.

One-sixth of all children in the United States live in poverty, among the highest rates of industrialized nations.

Breaking the cycle of poverty in the United States is a primary concern for the U.S. Catholic bishops. CCHD is their domestic anti-poverty, social justice program. Its mission is to address the root causes of poverty in the United States through promotion and support of community-controlled, self-help organizations and education.

"CCHD was a program originally designed to alleviate poverty," said Terri Jarina, program director for parish social ministry for Office of Justice and Peace, Catholic Social Services, in the Diocese of Charlotte. "Over time, the bishops of the United States realized poverty is a bigger problem than originally thought, and their focus shifted to breaking the cycle of poverty."

CCHD supports local groups involved in creating jobs, improving neighborhoods, training adults for employment at a living wage, keeping schools safe and enriching for children, and raising leaders for the future.

The success of CCHD is due in large part to Catholics parishioners whose contributions to the annual appeal have made meeting CCHD's objectives possible over the years. Eighty-five cents out of every dollar received by CCHD goes directly to community empowerment, economic development and education programs that work to break the cycle of poverty.

This year's collection in the Diocese of Charlotte will be taken up during Masses the weekend of Nov. 20-21.

In 2003, the diocese had a 24.7 percent increase in donations over 2002, and was the third-highest diocese in the nation for per-Catholic giving. Catholics in western North Carolina, on average, donated 81 cents each, for a total diocesan collection of $162,526.

"This money easily helps thousands of people through the three national and 20 local grants the collection helped to fund in 2003," said Jarina.

Approximately 75 percent of the collection will be distributed to the national CCHD office, while the balance will remain in the Diocese of Charlotte for local grants.

According to Jarina, the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace examines social action in addition to acts of charity, to learn why poverty happens and determine how to overcome it.

Although a number of factors contribute to poverty, lack of education is the primary cause in perpetuating the cycle of poverty.

"Education is the most critical divide between a lifetime of poverty and the opportunity to escape poverty," said Katherine Newman, Ph.D., professor of urban studies at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Business. "High school dropouts are almost guaranteed a lifetime of living in poverty."

"CCHD looks at how money awarded through grants can help keep people from sliding back into poverty," said Jarina.

Two books on Christian-Jewish understanding

REVIEWED BY EUGENE J. FISHER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Robert Schoen says that "What I Wish My Christian Friends Knew About Judaism" grew out of his desire to answer the many questions Christians asked him over the years. No doubt Catholic publisher Loyola Press also saw the need for some answers to Christian curiosity.

Schoen finds this curiosity quite natural because, as he rightly notes, Judaism and Christianity stem from the same roots in biblical Israel, and Christianity was in its beginnings a Jewish movement. This common rooting explains the origins of many Christian beliefs and religious practices, he says.

His chapter, "Going to Church," illustrates something of the deep connections Christian liturgy has even today with Jewish liturgy, ranging from the close parallels in the wording of our prayers, such as the Our Father and the Kaddish, to the rituals and symbols (bread, wine, water) through which we encounter the divine.

Then he takes the reader "Inside the Synagogue" for a tour that includes the role of the cantor and rabbi, Jewish education, Jewish priests and how Jews confess their sins.

In the section "Who's in Charge?" he explains that the answer is no one person, such as the pope. He explains Jewish religious festivals and life-cycle events, along with issues of what it is like to be a Jew "in the world" outside the synagogue and Jewish home.

Schoen is a genial and often humorous guide — or sherpa — through the complexities of Jewish religious groups, from Orthodox and Reform to Conservative and Reconstructionist Judaism.

At the end he calls for Jews and Christians to "make this often-troubled world one of peace and harmony." The book contains a glossary of Jewish terms and a list of recommended readings.

Moshe Aumann's "Conflict and Connection: The Jewish-Christian-Israel Triangle" will be of great interest to anyone taking part in or wishing to understand the contemporary dialogue between Christianity and Judaism.

Aumann first became interested in the story when he served, from 1987 to 1990, with the Israeli Embassy in Washington as its liaison with the Christian churches. He narrates the story well, giving an excellent overview of the parting of the ways between church and synagogue in the early centuries and historical encounters since.

Aumann then describes what he calls a "sea change" in the relationship that took place after the Second World War and the Holocaust, singling out the Catholic Church as "a special case" not only because of its size but also because it has played since the 1960s "a pioneering role in instituting the theologically wrenching revisions in those doctrines that have moved other major Christian churches to follow in its footsteps."

As one who has attempted to navigate those changing seas for almost three decades with the U.S. Catholic bishops' Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, I can attest to the accuracy of his analysis of the events and documents (many of which he includes in an appendix) of the period he covers.

Aumann speaks of three lingering problems: anti-Semitism, Christian missions to the Jews, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Once again he singles out the Catholic Church for leadership in responding to these continuing challenges.

In his conclusion, he addresses the Jewish community, calling for a response commensurate with the tremendous movement toward the Jewish people on the part of Christians.

Fisher is an associate director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, where he works on relations between the Catholic and Jewish communities.

Power of prayer is power of God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

During a spirituality seminar I attended recently, there was a discussion about the power of prayer. People shared wonderful stories — a few were about poignant spiritual encounters, but most were about miracles resulting from earnest, persistent prayer or the combined prayers of many people for the same cause.

I understood that the storytellers were relating their gratitude for God's deliverance from their suffering.

Then came the plaintive question: "But when my sister's little son was suffering so much, we prayed and prayed, but he wasn't saved. What about our prayer?"

It reminded me of a comment I once heard from a wise, very spiritual woman: "People talk about the 'power of prayer,' but that's not really what it is. It's the power of God."

Supernatural events don't happen as a result of human will — a miracle doesn't take place because a person prays hard enough, or long enough, or if enough people pray for it. The human will alone is just not that strong. Since the beginning of humankind we've always had difficulty believing that we ourselves don't, somehow, author life.

In this weekend's Gospel story, the rulers, soldiers and one of the criminals are caught in that fallacy. Jesus the man is the holiest one they've ever seen. If he's so powerful, he ought to be able to save himself from death.

But Jesus knows that his human will — however strong — cannot save him from death. Conforming his will to the Father's is all he can do.

That is what brings ultimate salvation. That is the power of prayer: By conforming our will to God's, we enter into the divine life, the kingdom of God, something much greater than anything we might humanly want to "save."

The other criminal recognizes this power of God in Jesus' accepting God's will and shows us how to pray to Jesus to draw us to himself and the reign of God.

Third-grade golfer sinks competition

HIGH POINT — Tanner Owen, a third-grader at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, became the national champion for the 7- and 8-year-old division in the Mutual of Omaha Drive, Chip & Putt Junior Challenge, held in Orlando, Fla. Oct. 23.

More than 30,000 boys and girls ages 7 to 14 participated in the event, playing in local and regional tournaments across the United States and Canada to earn a chance to compete in the national tournament.

Tanner competed with 21 other regional finalists to win his title.

Tanner, son of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church parishioners Vicki and Kevin Owen, also recently won the National Junior Golf Club's Future Pro of the Year award in the 6 to 9-year-old age group. With a stroke average of 76, Tanner has earned first place in six North Carolina golf tournaments hosted by the club this year. He also has won second place in the club's Southeast Regional Tour Championship in South Carolina.

Church's essay contest winners announced

HIGH POINT — Winners of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church's Respect Life Essay Contest are Brittany Spear, first place; Josie Rathburn, second place; and Niall Moreira and Aaron Pugh, tied for third. All are eighth-grade students at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point.

The contest was sponsored by the church's Respect Life Committee and held in honor of Respect Life Month in October. Students chose topics from a list of specific issues and each had to defend his or her position on that issue.

Spear, daughter of Bob and Jeanine Spear of Colfax, wrote about in vitro fertilization. Rathburn, daughter of David and Joan Rathburn of High Point, wrote her essay on assisted suicide. Moreira, son of Roy and Geraldine Moreira of Jamestown, wrote about euthanasia. And Pugh, daughter of Richard and Rebecca Pugh of High Point, wrote her paper on abortion.

Winners received certificates and gift cards from committee chairman Don Mulligan.

Ghost stories shared around the Writer's Café

CHARLOTTE — Spooky tales were shared during the recent Writer's Café at St. Matthew School.

Danielle Greene's fourth-grade class showcased their original ghost stories during the Oct. 25 event. After two weeks of writing and editing stories, the students decorated their classroom like a café and invited their parents to hear their scary stories, with titles such as "Spooky" and "The Night I Was Really, Really Scared."

"This is an opportunity for students to share their work and get feedback from their peers," said Greene. "They are asked to fill out a conference summary which gives them both positive and negative feedback."

At the end of the Writer's Café, the students turned their work in to Greene to be graded.

"Writer's Café is a way to change the environment in the classroom and just make writing more fun," said Greene. "The students get to be creative and take ownership for their work."

The program is part of the school's commitment to excellence in writing, with several other classes holding similar events.

Third-graders enjoyed Book Talk, where students read books and discussed them in small groups. Kindergarten students are writing and drawing in journals and sharing them with each other to foster an appreciation of literature.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Don't be labeled, don't label

Only we can define ourselves

Labels. Don't ya just love 'em? For one moment during your freshman year of high school, you got excited about the new Lara Croft Tomb Raider game that let you save the game without collecting a save-game crystal, and now for the rest of your high school life you are a "gamer."

In a moment of weakness, you spaced out the fact that your teacher had been calling your name, and now you are eternally an "airhead."

Here are a few more names that have been passed out to unsuspecting high schoolers over the last five decades, labels never shaken but always dreaded.

Jock: an athlete, especially in college or one characterized by excessive concern for machismo.

Nerd: a foolish, inept or unattractive person or a person who is single-minded or accomplished in scientific or technical pursuits but is felt to be socially inept.

Dork: a stupid, inept or foolish person.

Slacker: one lacking in diligence or due care or concern; negligent; a slack worker.

Geek: a person who is singleminded or accomplished in scientific or technical pursuits but is felt to be socially inept.

Skaters: skateboard types; long hair, long shorts, alternative T-shirts, music.

Friends, peers, classmates and even teachers love to assign labels to others, defining them with one word — and eliminating the need actually to get to know them. "Oh, he's a jock. I don't like him."

He may be athletic but he may love Shakespeare and listen to Bob Dylan. It isn't possible to be defined by one word.

We are made up of an array of talents and thoughts and likes and dislikes. And we change, we adapt.

At the beginning of high school, I still listened to the Top 40. By the time I graduated, I searched every independent label I could find to place in my CD player.

No one word can define us. We define ourselves.

Taking a shot at defining myself, I came up with many odd terms and also contradictory terms to describe me:

God-loving, college football fanatic, creative writer, stylish, dorky, a gamer, a duathlete, a people person, an introvert, a cynic, an optimist, a family member, a friend, a music lover, a person with great personal hygiene, a person with poor cleaning habits, an uncle, a godparent, a child, a lover of fine foods, an expert on cheeseburgers and fries.

Peers define us, they label us, they segregate us, and they talk to us or avoid us because of labels. It's part of it all, and it doesn't end when high school ends, so now is the time to define yourself. Then just ignore those labels.

There are many ways to avoid the one-word labels Webster's Dictionary provides for dorks, princesses, jocks and skaters. One rule of thumb: If the words are in the dictionary, don't limit yourself to them. I am pretty happy with the crazy collage of personality contradictions I have come up with (although classmates from high school probably still think of me the same way they used to).

When I began to define myself as a teen, I have to admit that "God-loving" wasn't the first term I thought of. I grew into it. It quickly became first on the list because it encompassed so many attributes I didn't have to write down, for instance: a giver, a forgiver, a person who may not always succeed but tries to be honest and a person who also tries not to label the kid sitting next to me.

So let's start from there: "I am a God loving ..."

Crosses with three arms

Q. I just returned from Russia and have questions about the Orthodox crosses with three arms, one of them slanting. Can you explain what they mean? Also, crosses on the "steeple" of many Orthodox church buildings seem to be placed over a curved symbol, signifying an anchor. Is that true? (Louisiana)

A. The cross with three bars was in wide use very early in Christianity. According to legend the icon of the Mother of God of the Passion (Our Lady of Perpetual Help) was painted by St. Luke. Whether it was or not, it is an extremely ancient work of art and interestingly has the three-armed cross in the upper right-hand corner.

Metropolitan Ilarion Ohienko of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church has written an extensive study of the three-bar cross. He calls it the Ukrainian National Cross, although it traditionally is identified also with other Orthodox, and some Eastern Catholic, churches.

The Christian theologian Origen (died about 254) tells of seeing the cross with the signboard above our Lord's head on which Pilate wrote the charge against him and the footrest where Christ's feet were nailed.

Most crucifixes with which we are familiar bear a small inscription near the top with letters standing for Jesus of 'Diabolical triad' leads people away from God, pope says at audience

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Violence, greed and covetousness are a "diabolical triad" that leads people away from God and from honoring human dignity, Pope John Paul II said.

When people trust in their own power instead of in God, they not only end up disappointed, but they harm others, the pope said Nov. 10 at his weekly general audience.

Pope John Paul's talk focused on Psalm 62 and its affirmation, "Only in God is my soul at rest; from him comes my salvation."

About 7,000 people crowded into the Vatican audience hall for the main part of the audience. Another 6,000 people, who could not fit into the hall after the audience was moved from St. Peter's Square, had a brief audience with the pope in St. Peter's Basilica.

The pope told his visitors that Psalm 62 presents two types of trust, "one good and one perverse, which lead to two different types of moral conduct."

Trust in the Lord is "the source of eternity and of peace," he said.

Those who turn their backs on God and try to rely on their own powers, the pope said, seek "security and stability in violence, in theft and in riches."

"The first false god is the violence that humanity unfortunately continues to follow in our blood-soaked days," he said.

"This idol is accompanied by an immense entourage of wars, oppression, abuse of power, torture and despicable murders inflicted without a hint of remorse," the pope said.

The Pope Speaks

"The second false god is theft, which is expressed in extortion, social injustice, usury and in political and economic corruption," he said.

"Richness is the third idol to which human hearts are attached in the foolish hope of being able to save them from death and to assure them the prize of power and prestige," the pope said.

Pope John Paul told his visitors, though, that "if we were more aware of our fallen nature and our limits as creatures, we would not choose the path of trusting in idols, nor would we organize our lives according to a scale of fragile and inconsistent pseudo values."

"We would orient ourselves toward that other type of trust, that which is centered on the Lord," he said.

Pope John Paul prayed that all Christians would increase their trust in God, using his commandments as the "guiding star in daily behavior, in moral decisions and in lifestyles."

our blessed Mother, where the woman with the moon under her feet (Revelation 12:1) is understood to be Mary. Elsewhere, the circular symbol signifies the world, the universal salvation effected by the crucifixion of Jesus.

There are at least 300 different forms of the cross in the history of Christian art and symbolism, many of them with the three cross bars, and certainly there are more than 300 explanations of their origin and meaning.

Each one is meant to portray in different ways what Christians believe about the death and resurrection of our Savior. It's not surprising that interpretations sometimes overlap, that a meaning originally intended becomes obscure in time and that the same symbol takes on more than one meaning over the centuries.

Peace on earth by saving the earth

When Wangari Maathai won this year's Nobel Peace Prize, some critics objected that honoring an environmentalist distracted from traditional peace work.

In 1977 Maathai, a 64-year-old biologist, founded the Green Belt Movement in Kenya that empowered poor women by paying them to plant more than 30 million tree seedlings in their communities. Her movement promotes sustainable development while recognizing the intertwined problems of war, environmental degradation, poverty and the low status of women.

In awarding the prize to Maathai the Nobel committee noted, "Peace on earth depends on our ability to secure our living environment." Just weeks before, a U.N. report cited deforestation and the scarcity of water — both exacerbated by global warming — as repeated causes of armed conflict in Africa.

Awareness among academics, scientists and recently the business community has begun linking peace on earth with saving the earth. In both Business Week (Aug. 16, 2004) and National Geographic (Sept., 2004) writers and editors draw attention to global warming and its dire consequences. They cite dramatic changes in climate that indicate human impact on the environment.

For example, geochemical records of carbon dioxide, a major greenhouse gas, show the current level (378 parts per million) at the highest-known carbon dioxide level in the last 40 million years.

Faith & the Marketplace

FATHER JOHN
S. RAUSCH

In Peru, the Quelccaya ice cap is shrinking at the rate of 600 feet per year, 40 times faster than in 1978. And scientists recognize that hurricane strength, related to temperature, is strongly connected to global carbon dioxide levels.

The result of rapid climate change means uncertain agricultural production and altered patterns of living for humanity and the rest of creation on earth.

Yet not everyone agrees with these findings. Some argue the scientific observations could fit nature's acceptable pattern of change with little for humanity to do about global warming. They fear the rollbacks demanded by the Kyoto agreement would cripple the U.S. economy, create a carbon-constrained world and challenge the free-flowing lifestyle of many Americans. Their solution: live with a warmer world and trust science will eventually engineer schemes to create a desirable environment.

For National Geographic, global climate change is real and human activity using fossil fuels is exacerbating, if not causing, the problem: "Ice is melting, rivers are running dry, and coasts are eroding. ... These aren't projections; they are facts on the ground."

The editors reference a report from the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change stating that human activity is almost certainly responsible for most of the past century's warming. They quote Professor George Philander, a climate expert at Princeton University, who says: "We're now geological agents, capable of affecting the processes that determine climate."

For people of faith "the ecological crisis is a moral issue," according to Pope John Paul II. His statement, "The Ecological Crisis: A Common Responsibility," emphasizes that "respect for life and for the dignity of the human person extends also to the rest of creation." He encourages converting from a lifestyle of consumption, addressing the structures of poverty, rejecting war with its inherent ecological destruction, promoting ecological responsibility and appreciating the beauty of nature.

With Maathai, the pope shares a more holistic vision for the world than either economics or science can provide. His statement was issued on Jan. 1, 1990, the World Day of Peace, thus, like Maathai, linking ecology and peace for a world that respects the common good.

The amazing ministries of retired priests

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

During retreats, I have met 70- and 80-year-old priests who care for several parishes, often traveling long distances to reach them. Others fill in so pastors can get away, while others are the backbone of various ministries in their dioceses.

When we reviewed the age categories of priests in the research studies we conducted, we usually focused on active priests. Retired priests generally were envisioned as being in the background due to health problems, lack of energy and immobility. Yet, I realize that retired priests today are definitely in the foreground!

These priests often exude an energy and strength that younger generations don't have. It's not that younger people lack energy or are weaker. Rather, it is that older people have a unique toughness that comes with age, despite physical degeneration. They know how to better pace themselves and calmly face seemingly overwhelming problems.

Once these men are gone, many dioceses already hurting for priests will be devastated. The number of U.S. parishes without a resident pastor is growing. Without these retired men, that number would be much larger. We especially will feel their loss in hospital ministry and ministry to the elderly.

As I've listened to retired priests tell of their priesthood, I've realized that the wisdom and inspiration they pass on to younger priests are awesome. In fact, when younger priests tell their stories, many point to an older priest as their ideal. The loss of these older priests means that the church will lose not only an essential priestly support system, but more important, it will lose a wisdom community.

As dire as this may sound, elderly priests would tell us not to fear. Many who in their prime were autonomous pastors now advocate giving more responsibility to lay leaders. Instead of seeing a crippled church, many see new models of collaboration with the laity adding a fresh vitality.

And what about elderly priests serving as wise mentors for younger priests? Many elderly priests would tell us that today's youth are much more independent and also more knowledgeable. As water finds its level, so too will younger priests find the spirituality and wisdom needed to carry on, be it from other priests or the laity.

Our retired priests will one day be missed dearly. But their love for the priesthood and the people it serves will live on in those they have touched. With this spirit of love, the church and priesthood will not only survive, but also thrive.

Election 2004: The role of 'moral values'

Increasingly pro-life country votes for morals

This election was supposed to be about terrorism, the economy and Iraq. But there was a more pressing issue that motivated people to vote this year, and that was the issue of moral values.

According to exit polls from the National Election Pool, the official election source for broadcast and cable television stations, "moral values" was cited as the most important issue in this election by more people than any other concern. The economy and jobs was next, followed by terrorism, then the war in Iraq.

Among those who cited moral values as paramount, 80 percent voted for Bush and 18 percent voted for Kerry.

While abortion and marriage certainly were not the centerpiece of either campaign, their importance to voters cannot be underestimated.

Eleven states had ballot initiatives to defend traditional marriage and each one passed by a healthy margin. Sixty-five percent of Floridians voted to overturn bad court rulings and amend their constitution to allow enactment of a law requiring parental notification for minor girls seeking abortions.

Only California bucked the apparent moral values trend by voting to put billions of dollars into embryonic stem cell and human cloning research.

The 2002 mid-term election suggested that the pro-life position is a "plus" for candidates, and this election proved it again. The House of Representatives will have more pro-life votes after this election, but the real story is the Senate, where there were significant pro-life gains.

New senators who vote pro-life were elected in Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina and South Dakota. In Louisiana, a senator who sometimes voted pro-life was replaced by a strong supporter of the cause.

These new senators will provide a stronger margin in the Senate on issues such as abortion, human cloning and embryo-destructive research. Their most significant impact, however, may be on judicial nominations.

In a statement issued the day after the election, Elizabeth Cavendish, president of Pro-Choice American (formerly National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League) warned President Bush against trying to "pack the Supreme Court with new anti-choice zealots." Planned Parenthood's Gloria Feldt promised to "fight these and many other battles" with "unity of purpose and fierceness of heart to protect our human rights."

These and other abortion advocates are utterly out of step with the world around them.

Last year the pro-abortion Center for Gender Equity published a survey of women showing the startling result that, of all the "top priority" issues for the women's movement, "keeping abortion legal" ranked dead last. The survey also showed that a majority of women — 51 percent — believe that abortion should never be permitted, or permitted only in cases of rape, incest or life endangerment (2 percent of abortions yearly).

More good news comes from the recent Pace University/Rock the Vote poll. "Rock the Vote" was launched by MTV in 1992 to get young people to register to vote. And where do these super-hip-MTV-rock-the-voters stand on abortion? According to their own poll, 54 percent of them are pro-life.

It shouldn't have surprised us that "moral values" came first.

THE MORALITY OF EATING

Catholic advocates encourage people to think about food connections

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Although an emphasis on food always increases around the Thanksgiving holiday, Holy Cross Brother David Andrews, head of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, thinks this focus should be year-round.

He is not talking about a constant food fest either, but of helping people develop a deeper awareness of where their food comes from and to make conscious decisions to support farmers and food companies that do not exploit workers.

This kind of food consciousness is growing, he said, and has been fueled, in part, by the campaign "Eating Is a Moral Act," sponsored for the third year by the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, which is based in Des Moines, Iowa.

The campaign — with its flyers, seminars and educational materials focusing on moral decisions that come into play in food purchasing — seems to run up against the massive amounts of highly processed convenience foods available in this country and the ever burgeoning number of fast-food chains.

But the campaign's message that people need to think before eating — and not just for health reasons — is striking a chord for many Catholics across the United States and, in particular, on Catholic college campuses, Brother Andrews told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview from St. Louis.

To get the message to the local level, he has worked with a number of Catholic school superintendents and food service directors urging them to buy school lunch food from local farms.

He recently visited a Catholic school in Florida that has taken the notion of using local food a step further. Hope Rural School, run by Dominican Sisters for migrant farmworkers' children in Indiantown, has a large garden on the school grounds where the staff grows their own produce for school meals.

"They're doing the kind of stuff I'd like to see more schools do," Brother Andrews said.

He stressed that these students clearly know where their food comes from and can also start to see the connections between food and social justice.

Students at Jesuit-run Gonzaga College High School in Washington, hardly a school within a farming community, are also getting the connection that all foods don't originate in a packaged, processed form.

That's because their social justice teacher, Andrew Turner, operates a 20-acre farm in nearby Upper Marlboro, Md., with his wife, Avis, when he is not in class.

Turner devotes a portion of the year's studies to food issues, pointing out how food factory employees and migrant farmworkers are often grossly underpaid. He urges his students not to take their food for granted, but he admits that is a hard lesson to get across to students primarily from the Washington suburbs.

He said students really begin to understand the issue when they participate in a school-sponsored service project of helping migrant workers on a Florida farm.

They also seem to respect him for the work he puts into farming.

The Turners, parishioners at St. Peter Church in Waldorf, have been farming the family property for 15 years in a region of the country that is rapidly becoming more developed with neighborhoods and shopping centers.

They raise corn, tomatoes, beans, squash, melons and cut flowers for their farming business called TGIF, for Thank God It's Fresh, and sell the produce at three different farmers' markets each week during growing season. Avis Turner also works two days a week as a clinical social worker.

The couple says that the extra income they make from farming has helped them pay Catholic school tuition for their four children and now helps pay college tuition for their oldest child.

They also see spiritual benefits to farming.

Andrew said maintaining the farm, which is particularly challenging in the spring and early fall while he is teaching, has taught him to deal with life's ups and downs and to accept whatever happens.

He said when certain crops do not yield much of a harvest he is reminded that "there are certain things in life you have no control over."

He also appreciates the physical labor and the time of quiet.

"Even in the mundane hard work, I can turn to God and hear his voice speak loudly," he told CNS.

Avis, who works on the farm along with a handful of students they hire each year, also sells the produce, and finds that part of her job just as spiritually rewarding as working in the fields because it gives her the opportunity to talk to so many people.

Regular customers not only get to put a face to the product they purchase, but she said they also will frequently talk to her about their lives, which she said gives her a unique "opportunity to witness" her own faith.

The Turners, busy now with canning fruits and vegetables, not with planting, harvesting and selling, are ready for winter.

"We just finished the last farmers' market," said Andrew Nov. 2. "I love Thanksgiving because then the farm's at rest."

KINGS MOUNTAIN — For Christie Morrison, the newly renovated Christ the King Church means her spiritual home is finally complete.

As one of the three surviving founding members of the church, she wasn't going to miss the dedication Mass, celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis Nov. 9, that brought months of renovation and refurbishing to a close.

"That's why it means so much to me to see the beauty of it," said Morrison. "It's a great improvement. Pews are changed, walls are painted. It's a beautiful church."

Christ the King Church, a mission of St. Mary Church in Shelby, had suffered structural deterioration over the years. But damage from recent flooding prompted Father Eric Houseknecht, pastor, to give

SAFER STREETS

Father Peter McQuinn, pastor at Epiphany Church in Chicago, shows some of the ammunition collected in a lockbox to Officer Daniel Martinez from the Chicago Police Department. The box was set up at the parish to collect handguns and lock them up as part of a program in September to make the Little Village neighborhood safer.

Churches fight violence with gun turn-ins, other safety efforts

CHICAGO (CNS) — In a period when murders dropped by more than 22 percent across Chicago, the police district that includes the city's Little Village neighborhood is on pace to meet or beat the 2003 total of 37 murders.

Those statistics are challenging Epiphany Church and other Catholic parishes in the neighborhood to step up their efforts to bring peace to a community torn apart by gangs, substance abuse and domestic violence.

Father Peter McQuinn, pastor of Epiphany, said his parish has expanded its ongoing efforts advocating against violence in conjunction with other churches in the community.

Each of the churches recently hosted a gun turn-in program over four weekends.

At Epiphany, Father McQuinn stationed himself in the church at announced times, near a locked box placed in front of the altar to Our Lady of Guadalupe. Anyone could bring in a gun, no questions asked, and place it in the box. None of the other parishes received more than two guns, but Epiphany got eight, Father McQuinn said.

One "abuela," or grandmother, brought in two guns with the priest's encouragement.

"She grew up in a country, a culture, where it was normal to have guns," he said.

But even if the people who have the guns never intend to use them for a crime, they can be found by children or be stolen, Father McQuinn said. People think of the New Year's Eve tradition of firing guns into the air as harmless, but people have been killed accidentally that way, he said.

The gun turn-in has been "a success in one way," he added. "For five weeks, it gave us an opportunity to preach about keeping our homes safe."

Keeping homes safe is a topic that comes up frequently at Epiphany — whether at the annual Day of the Dead march and Mass, which includes erecting outdoor altars to victims of violence, or at summer street Masses celebrated near victims' homes or at pre-baptism classes for parents and godparents.

Father McQuinn said not all parishioners want to hear messages about violence, but he doesn't intend to stop preaching about it.

"You have too much dignity not to be told the truth," he said. "It's a bad idea to have a handgun in your home when you have three kids around."

Moral support: Despite criticism, pope met with Arafat 12 times

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II considered Yasser Arafat the legitimate leader of the Palestinian people and thought his long struggle for a Palestinian homeland merited moral support.

Primarily for those reasons, the pope met with Arafat 12 times, despite harsh criticism from Israeli and Jewish leaders and many others.

Their encounters included a historic visit to Arafat's headquarters in Bethlehem, West Bank, in 2000, during the pope's Holy Land pilgrimage. On that occasion, Arafat placed a medal around the pope's neck to honor the pontiff for supporting the Palestinian cause.

Under Arafat's leadership, the Vatican opened diplomatic ties with the Palestinian National Authority, paralleling the Holy See's diplomatic relations with Israel. In 2000, the Vatican sealed a groundbreaking "fundamental agreement" with the Palestinian leadership regarding church rights in Palestinian territories.

Now, Vatican officials want to make sure Arafat's successor will honor those agreements and keep the channels of dialogue open with the Christian minority in the Holy Land.

"But there is also a chance, given the current tensions, that instead of moderates, the more extremist people will move in," a Vatican official said Nov. 10, the day before Arafat's death in Paris.

"We hope that, because we all learn from history, the Palestinian people who have suffered so much will know how to choose leaders who can get them out of the present situation," the official said.

Part of the Vatican's interest in future Palestinian leadership lies in its concern for the approximately 40,000 Christians who live in the Palestinian territories. Although a draft Palestinian constitution envisioned a lay state, it also declared Islam the official religion.

Pope reminds people to share with needy at Thanksgiving

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As people express gratitude at Thanksgiving for the fruits of the earth, they should remember to share them with the needy, Pope John Paul II said.

The pope made his comments during a noon blessing at the Vatican Nov. 14, the day celebrated in Italy this year as Thanksgiving. Several hundred people standing in a light rain cheered the pontiff as he spoke from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square.

The pope said he joined in a special way with the prayers of agricultural workers as they gave thanks at harvest time.

All people should be "grateful to the Lord for what nature and human labor produce for our sustenance" and should also be "ready to share our resources with those who are in need," he said.

The pope said that for Christians the full expression of thanksgiving comes in the Eucharist.

"In every Mass, we bless the Lord, God of the universe, presenting to him the bread and wine as fruits of the earth and human labor. To these simple foods Christ has linked his own sacrificial gift," he said.

All Christians, he added, are called to offer to God their daily work and their very existence, as Christ did, he said.

The pope spoke in a relatively strong voice during his nine-minute appearance. His prepared talk was very short, but he took time to greet groups of Polish pilgrims who held banners in the square.

Pope urges Iraqi authorities to ensure fair elections

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged Iraq's interim authorities to ensure fair elections and resolve internal conflicts through dialogue, using military force only as a last resort.

In a speech to the new Iraqi ambassador, Albert Ismail Yelda, to the Holy See Nov. 15, the pope reiterated his closeness to "the dear people of Iraq," tried by war, violence and terrorism.

The pope spoke as U.S. and Iraqi forces were concluding the largest military operation in many months against insurgents based in Fallujah, Iraq.

Yelda told the pope that Iraq and the Vatican would "be working together relentlessly" to reach the common objectives of peace, justice, freedom and democracy.

Many times the pope, who opposed the U.S.-led war in Iraq, has called on the international community to support reconstruction and the interim government there. He met Nov. 4 with interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi, whom he also encouraged to press ahead with democratic reform and the guarantee of religious freedom in Iraq.

In his meeting with Yelda, he urged the interim Iraqi government to "work untiringly to settle disputes and conflicts through dialogue and negotiation, having recourse to military force only as a last resort."

The pope said the fundamental principle of the rule of law "is basic for any modern society that truly seeks to safeguard and promote the common good."

Once rights are guaranteed by legislation, he said, "they will enable all citizens, regardless of religious belief or affiliation, to make their proper contribution to the building up of Iraq."

He encouraged the Iraqi interim government to do all it could to ensure that the elections now planned for January will be fair and transparent.

The pope said the Catholic Church "is committed to assisting your people in constructing a more peaceful and stable nation."

Christian churches in Iraq have been bombed on three separate occasions since last August.

Yelda told the pope that Iraq would work with the Holy See to bring "a state of harmony and tolerance between all the religions" and to eliminate wars, AIDS and famine.

USCCB plans, priorities range from health insurance to vocations plan

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops Nov. 15 overwhelmingly approved a set of priorities and plans for the next year that includes such new efforts as creating a national strategy on vocations and developing materials to explain the moral case for the nation to cover the uninsured.

The priorities and plans, which passed 270-16 on the first day of the bishops' annual fall general meeting, included mostly ongoing programs of USCCB committees and staff offices.

A few of the items are new projects on the agenda for the coming year and beyond. They included an assortment of intermittent activities such as their publishing office plan to provide materials for the international observance of World Youth Day.

Other items are likely to be one-time efforts, such as producing materials for the 25th anniversary of a pastoral letter on racism, planned by the Secretariat for African-American Catholics.

Look for more coverage of the bishops' annual fall general meeting in the next issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

TORCH BEARERS STOPS IN DIOCESE DURING INTERNATIONAL TREK

CHARLOTTE — Three Catholic churches in the Diocese of Charlotte will soon share in events uniting two countries and cultures.

A torch from the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe in Mexico City will stop at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte Nov. 29, Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville Nov. 30 and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point Dec. 1.

They are three of more than 60 stops along the torch's 3,813-mile journey to St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, an "international religious pilgrimage" that began Oct. 10 and ends Dec. 12, the feast day of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

By the trip's end, more than 27,000 people will have carried the torch along with a reproduction of the Guadalupe image.

"The event has been organized as a torch run for the past two years, as in reminiscent of the Olympic torch run," said Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church.

"I have extended hospitality to the runners and volunteers," he said. "We will welcome the pilgrims here with a Mass at 7 p.m. and then with a meal."

The Mass, said Father Lawlor, will highlight the history of Our Lady of Guadalupe, one of the most revered saints in Latin America and is the patron saint of the Americas, including Mexico.

St. Juan Diego, the 16th-century Indian in Mexico who saw the visions of Our Lady of Guadalupe on Tepeyac hill in 1531, was canonized July 31, 2002 by Pope John Paul II at the basilica built on the site of the apparitions.

"The news of the apparitions and the miraculous image were a catalyst that increased Christian devotion and conversions," said Father Lawlor. "Historians estimate that in the first seven years after the apparitions, 8 million native Mexicans accepted the faith and were baptized."

At Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, the event begins with an evening fiesta and Spanish Mass. Early the next day, a send-off ceremony will be held as the torch and its message of love and solidarity travel to St. Rafael the Archangel Church in Raleigh.

Oblate Father Jack Kelly, pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, will bless a banner and the torchbearer during its stay in High Point.

"It gives us an opportunity as a parish community to share in the Mexican culture," said Father Kelly.

Immaculate Heart of Mary Church began offering a regular Spanish-language Sunday Mass in January of this year and continues to nurture its growing Hispanic ministry.

The torch run began in 2001 as a way to unite people separated by the border between the United States and Mexico and to promote friendship among communities in both countries. The event is sponsored by the Tepeyac Association of New York, a nonprofit agency uniting the efforts of 40 community organizations serving immigrants from Mexico.

Mexican Jesuits, asked by the New York Archdiocese to help with work for Mexican immigrants, sent Jesuit Brother Joel Magallan Reyes in 1996, and the following year he helped organize the association.

Led by Brother Magallan as executive director, the association emphasizes service to "the undocumented in New York City."

These immigrants "live under inhumane conditions, yet are ineligible for most services provided by the city," according to the association.

It said the torch run was organized to promote "dignity and permanent residency for all 9 million undocumented immigrants in the U.S."

"Until such time as the global community effectively addresses the root causes of undocumented migration, individual nations must confront the presence of the undocumented in a manner which upholds the dignity and basic human rights of all immigrants, regardless of their legal status," the association said.

The association said it is traditional for Mexicans to "run, carrying a torch" from the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe to their home town, arriving on Dec. 12.

"Bringing the torch to New York would be bringing a piece of home for the immigrants working and living in the United States," said an association press release. "Establishing their own religious traditions, wherever they live, is a way to empower their identity and enable them to live with more dignity among citizens who accept them."

Faithful celebrate renovated church

the church a major overhaul.

"Father Eric worked very hard for this renovation," said Morrison. "We're so proud of him and thankful to have him."

Parishioner Mal Brutko, whose daughter was the first child baptized in the church founded in 1983, was impressed with the church's new look.

"The changes are wonderful. It's like a whole new start," he said.

Beginning in the mid-1930s, when the first Catholic family is thought to have settled in Kings Mountain, Catholics had to travel to Shelby or Gastonia for Mass and catechetical instruction. Father Thomas Clements, then-pastor of St. Mary Church in Shelby, began celebrating Mass in the Kings Mountain American Legion Hall in 1960.

The congregation briefly utilized a former Presbyterian church after then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh established an apostolic center for training newly ordained priests in Kings Mountain. But the church buildings, having been constructed decades earlier, were suffering from disrepair.

By 1965, the apostolic training center was relocated from Kings Mountain, and local Episcopal and Lutheran congregations welcomed their Catholic neighbors to use their church facilities for Masses throughout the 1970s.

"We held Mass at different places for quite a few years while we raised money," said Morrison.

Finally in March 1981, four acres of land were purchased and 18 months later land was finally broken for a new Catholic church. The first Mass in the new Christ the King Church was celebrated in July 1983, with 43 families registered at the time. The church was dedicated on Nov. 29, 1983 — the feast day of Christ the King.

But from the beginning, the church was plagued with leaks culminating in the spring of 2004 with more than 18 inches of standing water in the basement, increasing the threat of mold and decay. The ebb and flow of water around the church also had destroyed the prior drainage system.

More than 24 feet of soil were removed and replaced, building up the ground level for proper drainage. With major landscaping and resurfacing efforts taking place outside, Father Houseknecht oversaw an almost total overhaul of the interior structure.

Walls were moved and erected, new rooms were created and skylights were added. Lighting fixtures were replaced, flooring was put down and new ductwork with an updated HVAC system was installed.

Pews were reconfigured, adding 74 linear feet of additional seating. The interior walls were painted to complement a giant mural of the Risen Christ behind the altar.

"We've refined the sense of the sacred through expansion of the sanctuary, increasing the window space and choosing a natural color palette to enhance the furnishings," said Father Houseknecht.

"It's beautiful," said Mary Allen, a parishioner of St. Mary Church who helped decorate Christ the King Church for its recent dedication. "I think the yellow (of the walls) brings it out. It's such an improvement."

The tabernacle was refinished and the altar of repose was rebuilt from two side panels originally from old choir stalls at Belmont Abbey. Two new meeting rooms and a room for reconciliation were also added.

"The renovation means everything," said Morrison. "It took a lot of work to get it done."

"We're real happy. Father Eric has done a wonderful job," said Brutko.

"Lord, fill this place with your presence, and extend your hand to all those who call upon you," prayed Bishop Jugis during the Mass. "May your Word here proclaimed and your sacraments here celebrated strengthen the hearts of all the faithful."

"May this building, which we dedicate to your name, be a house of salvation and grace where Christians gathered in fellowship may worship you in spirit and truth and grow together in love," said the bishop.

members and seven senators.

According to an analysis of the data by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Office of Government Liaison, the number of Catholic senators was unchanged at 24.

But the defeat of Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and the election win of Republican Mel Martinez of Florida left the Senate numbers at 11 Catholic Republicans and 13 Catholic Democrats, compared to 10 Republicans and 14 Democrats in the 108th Congress.

Similarly, the number of Catholics in the House of Representatives increased by four, from 126 to 130, according to the USCCB analysis, which included nonvoting Delegates Luis Fortuno, a Republican representing Puerto Rico, and Madeleine Bordallo, a Democrat from Guam.

But the number of Catholic Democrats declined by one from 73 to 72, according to the USCCB analysis. Catholic Republicans in the House increased by five, from 53 to 58. Catholics make up 30 percent of the House membership of the 109th Congress.

The 540 members of Congress include 100 senators, 435 representatives and five nonvoting members, who include four delegates, from the District of Columbia, Guam, American Samoa and the Virgin Islands, and one resident commissioner from Puerto Rico.

After Catholics and Baptists, the most-represented denominations in the 109th Congress are Methodists, at 63 in both houses; Presbyterians, at 50; Episcopalians, at 41; and Lutherans, at 20. Another 38 members of Congress identified themselves as Christians, without specifying a denomination, and seven listed no religious background.

Eleven senators and 26 House members identified themselves as Jewish, while 11 representatives and five senators said they belonged to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Other faith groups represented in the 109th Congress include the African Methodist Episcopal Church, Christian Scientist, Community of Christ, Eastern Orthodox, Pentecostal, Quaker, Seventh-day Adventist, Unitarian and United Church of Christ and Congregationalist.

In its analysis of the ethnic makeup of the 109th Congress, Congressional Quarterly said the number of African-Americans in Congress had increased by four with one in the Senate and 42 in the House. All are Democrats.

The number of Hispanics in Congress was up two in the Senate — one Democrat and one Republican — and increased by one in the House to 24 — 19 Democrats and five Republicans.

Asian-American representation in Congress remained the same at two senators and three House members, all Democrats, while the number of American Indians dropped by two to none in the Senate and one in the House.

Rep. Bobby Jindal, a Republican from Louisiana and a Catholic, becomes the only member of Asian Indian heritage in the 109th Congress and only the second Asian-American representative in history.

The number of women senators remained the same — 10 Democrats and four Republicans — while the 65 women in the House — 42 Democrats and 23 Republicans — represented a net increase of five.

Oblate Father John Gavin dies at 72

Priest served in Diocese of Charlotte, Vietnam

PHILADELPHIA — Oblate of St. Francis de Sales Father John T. Gavin, a priest who had served in the Diocese of Charlotte, died Nov. 12 in Temple University Hospital in Philadelphia. He was 72.

A Mass of Christian burial was held Nov. 19, with internment in the Oblate Cemetery at the De Sales Center in Childs, Md.

Among his many assignments, Father Gavin had served at St. Joseph Church in Asheboro from 1976 to 1979 and Holy Cross Church in Kernersville from 1979 to 1980.

He taught history at high schools in Pennsylvania, New York and Virginia, and served as a Catholic chaplain to the U.S. Army in Vietnam from 1970 to 1974, receiving a Bronze Star for his service.

He was admitted to Our Lady of Lourdes Medical Center in Camden, N.J., after suffering a heart attack in August 2004. He underwent quadruple bypass surgery and remained in the center's cardiovascular intensive care unit on a ventilator until Sept. 10, when he was transferred to Temple

Priests, deacons immersed in Spanish language

140,000-plus foreign-born residents, this is an all-too-common problem. Fortunately for the Hispanic population, more priests and deacons will now be able to celebrate the Mass in Spanish and converse with Hispanic parishioners in their native language.

Four priests and two permanent deacons participated in the inaugural pastoral Spanish immersion course held at St. Vincent de Paul Church Nov. 8-12. Participants spent five days learning "pastoral Spanish" — how to celebrate the Mass and sacraments in Spanish — as well as key aspects of Hispanic culture.

According to Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry, diocesan priests first requested a Spanish-language immersion course two years ago to enable them to answer the needs of their Hispanic parishioners.

A committee of 10 members was formed, consisting of Spanish teachers and Hispanics, and a survey was issued to all priests and deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte to assess interest in initiating a Spanish immersion program.

As part of their immersion experiences, each participant lived with a Hispanic family from a different country, allowing them to experience as many different cultures as possible.

"The committee felt it was important to learn not only vocabulary and grammar, but also culture, because every Hispanic culture or country is different," Sister Inkrott said.

Each Spanish-speaking country has its own dialect and culture, much like the United States compared to Great Britain, Australia or even our neighbor to the north, Canada.

"It's also important not to make immigrants 'tow the line,' (by requiring conformity to American customs) but allowing them to keep their own culture," Deacon Bob Desautels said.

He hopes to use his newly honed conversation skills in his prison ministry in the Winston-Salem area.

Deacon Desautels is also the chaplain of a Boy Scout troop that has five Hispanic Scouts this year. He said he is thinking of organizing a separate troop comprised entirely of Hispanic boys.

"We have to face the reality that we need to minister to all the people in our area, even though some of them don't speak English," he said.

Sonja Ramirez, a Spanish teacher with the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools and Brisbane Academy, was one of the immersion course instructors.

"It's a different approach to teaching adults," she said. "It's harder for adults to learn, but they pay attention better."

The participants received instruction on Hispanic culture and traditions; vocabulary and grammar; and phrases relevant to pastoral ministry, including celebration of the Mass, administration of the sacraments and common prayers.

Father Robert Ferris, pastor of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory, said the program would help him minister to his entire parish, including the 600-700 Hispanics who attend the weekly Spanish Mass.

"It's a disaster to not be able to communicate with your parishioners," he said. "You can't minister to someone unless you speak their language — you can't laugh with them, you can't cry with them."

ASHEVILLE — Fourth-graders at Asheville Catholic School are bringing meals and friendship to needy children.

As part of Asheville Catholic School's Outreach Program, the students are working with Our Place, a home that provides short-term emergency care for up to six youths age 18 years or younger who have been removed from their homes due to abuse or neglect.

The students' first visit to the group home on Oct. 26 taught them about children who are less fortunate than they are.

In a question and answer session led by Renaye Owen, Our Place program coordinator, the students learned that some children at the home were abused, neglected or had parents who temporarily could not keep them at home. Gathered in the living room, the students learned how the home is run, the rules the children follow and chores they perform.

However, due to confidentiality reasons, the two groups of children will never meet. Children typically remain at the home no longer than 90 days, but the Asheville Catholic students hope to make each resident feel special and realize there are other children who care about them.

The students will visit the home on the fourth Wednesday of each month, bring home-cooked meals for the young residents and decorate the home for the appropriate seasons.

With the help of parent volunteers, five of the fourth-graders prepared lasagna and brownies for this month's meal. Students also left small treat bags for the residents on their placemats at the dinner table.

FUTURE LEADERS

Students enjoy leadership conference experiences

HIGH POINT — For classmates Elise Bergman and Jennifer Lindh, participating in this year's Junior National Young Leaders Conferences in Washington, D.C. and Boston, Mass., helped them start preparing for a future in politics.

The close friends plan to run against each other next year for student council vice president of Immaculate Heart of Mary School. And they couldn't be more excited about it or more supportive of each other.

"We've worked on each other's campaigns before," said Jennifer, a seventh-grader. "We're good friends."

Jennifer said it seemed natural that they both want to excel in school politics and were chosen to participate in the annual Congressional Youth Leadership Council's conferences — in Washington Oct. 9-14 and in Boston Oct. 30-Nov. 4.

Themed "The Legacy of American Leadership," both conferences introduce young people to the tradition of leadership throughout U.S. history, while helping them develop their own leadership skills. Hundreds of middle school students throughout the United States participate in varied educational activities and presentations led by individuals in high-level positions, as well as young community leaders.

"I learned what it takes to be a leader, how to make people feel that they can trust you," said Elisa, also a seventh-grader.

In addition, she said she learned much more about the Salem witch trials, Paul Revere and the Battle of Lexington. People may not know this, Elise said, but Revere did not say, "The British are coming."

What he said was "the regulars are coming" because everyone in the town was British, said Elise.

Jennifer recalled the awe she felt walking through the underground tunnel to reach the U.S. Capitol in Washington, and seeing security officers everywhere. Also she remembered a display of gray stones etched with the names of notable women in U.S. history. One blank stone is reserved for the name of the first female U.S. president.

Jennifer's dream is for her name to be on that stone one day.

Elise hopes to become a pharmacist and to one day start a shelter for animals.

Of six Immaculate Heart of Mary School students chosen by school staff and administrators to attend these leadership conferences this year, only Elise and Jennifer were able to do so. Both girls' families are parishioners of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point.

HOMECOMING IN KERNERSVILLE

Bishop McGuinness holds induction ceremonies

KERNERSVILLE — Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School celebrated Homecoming weekend Oct. 15-17 by having its second annual Athletic Hall of Fame and the inaugural Distinguished Alumni Hall of Fame induction ceremonies.

In its second year, the Athletic Hall of Fame welcomed a group of outstanding athletes, including Joan Hrenko Novak (class of 1967), Jerry Hrenko (class of 1969) and Michael Taylor (class of 1989).

And for the first time, Bishop McGuinness honored a group of dedicated alumni who have supported their alma mater throughout the years.

"We celebrate the achievements of these inspiring alumni ... they live the school motto of 'Excel That You Might Better Serve' with their dedication to excellence, achievement and service," said Felipe Villalon, chairman of the Alumni Relations Committee.

The honorees for the Distinguished Alumni Hall of Fame included Donald J. Farrel (class of 1964); Sister of St. Joseph Joan Pearson (class of 1790), coordinator of Hickory Vicariate Hispanic Ministry; Father Wilbur Thomas (class of 1965), pastor of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville; Melvin J. Scales (class of 1972); and Eugene Rossitch Jr. (class of 1977).

The reception and ceremonies took place Oct. 16 in the school dining hall and the common areas where permanent recognition plaques are on display.

"The legacies of all these exceptional individuals are a gift of extraordinary value to the life and the living memory of this school," said George Repass, principal of Bishop McGuinness.

The weekend celebrations also included a brief recognition ceremony for the inductees Oct. 15, before the football game against Northside Christian High School. Bishop McGuinness won 19-0.

To wrap up the Homecoming celebration, Mass was celebrated at the school's chapel Oct. 17, followed by the Captain's Choice Golf Tournament at the Meadowlands Golf Course. The golf tournament was organized by the school's athletic department to raise funds for portable bleachers.

Students raise money for charities

HIGH POINT — In the last several weeks, students and staff of Immaculate Heart of Mary School have raised $1,330 for community charities.

Money has been sent to the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation and Belmont's House of Mercy, a care facility for people living with advanced AIDS. The fundraisers were part of the school's Outreach Opportunities Program.

Students raised funds by "buying" the opportunity to wear regular clothes to school instead of their uniforms.

Occupation and intrigue in World War II

REVIEWED BY JOHN H. CARROLL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Americans and Western Europeans this past year honored World War II veterans and the 60th anniversary of Europe's liberation with monuments and ceremonies. Books about the period continued to roll off the presses.

"The Twentieth Train: The True Story of the Ambush of the Death Train to Auschwitz" deals with the brutal Nazi occupation of Belgium and the resistance to it. Marion Schreiber, a German journalist, recounts the efforts of an underground group, composed mostly of Jews, to outwit the Gestapo and save as many of their compatriots as possible from roundups and shipments to "the East."

One of their most daring and successful operations was a small-scale attack to halt the 20th shipment of Jews from the camp at Mechelen to Auschwitz. In the ensuing confusion 231 prisoners escaped to freedom. Many did find refuge with their Belgian neighbors.

Schreiber has told an inspiring story of resistance.

"Inside the Vatican of Pius XII" is the memoir of Harold H. Tittmann Jr., a professional American diplomat who resided in Vatican City throughout the time that fascist Italy was at war with the United States and the subsequent German occupation of Italy.

In the early days of World War II, the American government realized that the Vatican would be a valuable listening post in the heart of Europe. But President Franklin D. Roosevelt knew Congress would not authorize formal diplomatic ties. So he asked his friend, businessman Myron Taylor, to be his personal representative to Pope Pius XII. The hostile Italian government allowed Taylor to visit neutral Vatican City.

Tittmann, as Taylor's representative, used papal diplomatic couriers to send reports to Washington where the Vatican had an apostolic delegation.

From his insider view, Tittmann recalls that the Vatican considered the Soviets a greater menace than the Nazis. The Vatican was upset when the United States allied with the Soviet Union because it had hoped that the United States might bring pressure on the Soviets to abandon the persecution of religions.

In contrast, the Vatican looked upon Hitler and the Nazis as an aberration for Germany.

Tittmann observes that the Vatican was aware of the Nazi persecution of Christians and non-Aryans in Germany. At the same time, while officially neutral, the Vatican was also in contact throughout the war with the anti-Nazi resistance in Germany.

And what of reports of Nazi atrocities?

"Pope Pius XII never did speak out while the war was in progress, so there is no evidence from which to judge whether it was the right thing to do or not," Tittmann writes. "If he had spoken out, would there have been fewer victims or more? There can be no formal answer. Personally I cannot help but feel that the Holy Father chose the better way by not speaking out and thereby saved many lives."

"The Battle for Rome" is a penetrating study on the early stages of the Allied campaign in Italy by American author Robert Katz.

American and British leaders, especially Prime Minister Winston Churchill, considered that an attack on the "soft underbelly of Europe" would liberate Italy, draw German defenders away from the Atlantic wall in France, and pave the way for a drive into the Balkans. However, the soft underbelly proved to be harder than expected.

Katz reviews the long and bloody campaign up the Italian boot from the American landing at Salerno in 1943 to the liberation of Rome in June 1944. He also covers the German occupation of Rome, the Italian Resistance, American intelligence operations, and Vatican diplomatic relations, including reports from Tittmann.

Katz is very critical regarding the silence of Pope Pius XII about the Nazi deportation of Rome's Jews to Auschwitz and the German reprisal against the Romans after a Resistance attack of German SS troops. However, he admits that many Jews found shelter in Rome's Catholic institutions and churches.

In 1974 Katz was taken to court in Rome for defaming the memory of Pope Pius XII with allegations he made in an earlier book, "Death in Rome." Katz was found guilty after a criminal trial. He received a 14-month prison sentence, but the verdict was overturned on appeal, and then dismissed by the Italian Supreme Court.

"The Battle for Rome" is based on declassified documents, interviews and memoirs. Katz is a serious scholar of the period and his book will be widely read.

Some readers will find his criticisms offset by the observations of diplomats or by statements from international Jewish leaders praising the actions of Pope Pius XII. Others will find that these new World War II books add information to the discussion of the period without putting to rest the old controversies.

ADVENT IS TO WAKE UP FAITH

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Technically I wasn't asleep. While I shivered in the chill of a darkened bedroom closet, pulling on corduroy trousers and wool socks, my wife and children were nestled in their warm, cozy beds, snoring softly. They were asleep, not I.

None of my neighbors who might have seen me in the ghostly fluorescent glow of my carport light, fumbling in my jacket pocket for car keys and stacking books in the back seat, would have mistaken me for a sleeper. Other drivers would have noted that my eyes were open, my hands responsive to the road.

I was legally awake. But mentally, I was fast asleep. It wasn't until I was about half an hour from the start of the class — way too late to turn around — that I thought about the painstaking hours I'd spent the day before searching the Internet for pictures of Gothic cathedrals to illustrate some key points.

It was like waking from sleep to realize I'd forgotten to bring a projector. The compelling images I'd found to enliven my presentation were trapped in the memory of my computer.

Many of us spend much of our lives in a half-awake state. There are so many demands on our time, so many voices and images clamoring for our attention, that we revert to a kind of sleepwalking in order simply to navigate the days.

Often we become so good at paying partial attention that we forget what it feels like to be really awake, really focused on what is immediately before us. That is the danger against which Christ warns us in Sunday's Gospel.

The pre-eminent task of Advent is waking up. In a season that ramps up the customary chatter of consumerism to deafening levels, it is an especially important call.

Questions:

What is one practical way I can live more wakefully during the Advent season? What are some routines in my life I can alter to help me listen for God's presence?

For Caviezel, acting not just a career but a calling

Catholic actor stars in 'I Am David'

BY JOSEPH PRONECHEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TRUMBULL, Conn. — Although Jim Caviezel never set out to be an actor, acting has become not just a career for him, but a calling.

Caviezel has become well-known for his portrayal of Christ in "The Passion of the Christ." He discussed his latest role in "I Am David," his acting and his Catholic faith during a short break from projects in Los Angeles.

A winner of numerous awards at several film festivals, including best picture and audience favorite, "I Am David" opens in theaters Dec. 3.

The story focuses on a 12-year-old boy in 1950s' Bulgaria who escapes from a Soviet concentration camp.

"I play the boy's mentor in the camp," Caviezel said about his role as Johannes. "I guide him throughout."

He explained that the story parallels "Man's Search for Meaning," Viktor Frankl's book about those who did and didn't survive in World War II concentration camps.

Both deal with "people who find (that) their joy and meaning and purpose in life, and ultimately peace, don't come from an exterior environment," he said. "What kind of joy would you find in a Nazi concentration camp as he (Frankl) did? But he was able to find it. Even if you are living in that prison, you can experience freedom."

In "I Am David," he said, "my character helps the boy understand that the strength of being who he is comes from within. It comes from an understanding of God."

Caviezel speaks honestly about what his faith means in his life.

"That's fundamental," he said. "Faith is not something you do just on Sunday — although that's a requirement. Faith is a way of life. That's really what it is with me."

His faith includes a deep devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

When Christ spoke from the cross, "he said, 'This is your mother,' so I'm obeying him," Caviezel said. "She's the greatest example of any human being who's ever existed on this earth. Jesus is God. But he exists completely and fully in her like no one else has ever done."

"I'm not embarrassed by my mother," Caviezel added, "as I think many Catholics are."

He summed up his devotion with a reference to St. Louis de Montfort, author of "True Devotion to Mary." The saint "clearly says" that Jesus said, "By loving my mother you do not love me any less, but by loving her more, you love me more," Caviezel said. "I go by that."

How does his faith relate to his moviemaking?

"I look for talented individuals I can work with," he said. "I look for redemption in stories. I was trained to find truth, (so) I look for people who are good and talented, regardless of their religion."

He mentioned that Mel Gibson did the same for "The Passion." Faith shouldn't give us "an elitist attitude," Caviezel added.

The actor wasn't concerned that controversy over "The Passion" would have any negative effect on his career.

"Controversy is a part of what happened to him when he was up on the cross," Caviezel said. "He was controversial because he spoke the truth, and it hurts."

The actor said he didn't know who the hypocrites were back then, "but I can tell you who they are today. I know my own hypocrisy, all the more so after playing him."

Caviezel pointed to those "who go to bed with Susie on Friday, go to church on Sunday and say the blood (of Christ) washes it away. You don't do that to your best friend," he said.

He stressed that such hypocrisy is a bad example that only turns others away from accepting the faith. "It comes down to what you do, not what you say," he noted. "Faith without works is dead."

"Every generation always has vice," he continued. "The problem with this generation is a lack of courage. You see a heck of a lot of 'guys' out there, but you don't see a lot of men. Stand up and be a man, a warrior."

"Every young boy wants to become a man," he added. "Our faith teaches us there is no greater love that to lay down one's life. Every boy wants to do this. Then tie that into your own marriage. A man loves his wife so much he's willing to lay his life down for her."

Has playing Christ in "The Passion" affected his spiritual life? "It helped me to pray in a much deeper way," Caviezel reflected. "As far as how it affected my life, time will tell."

Study: Abortion linked to later anxiety problems

prior history of anxiety. After controlling for race and age at the time of the survey, researchers found that, compared to women who carried the unintended pregnancy to term, women who aborted were 30 percent more likely to subsequently report all the symptoms associated with a diagnosis for generalized anxiety disorder (GAD).

If the excess cases found in the study are projected onto the entire population of women having abortions, there may be as many as 40,000 or more GAD cases per year attributable to abortion. Since many women participating in the NSFG do not report their past abortions, the results may underestimate the full impact of abortion reactions.

"Our study suggests that clinicians treating women with anxiety problems may find it useful to inquire about their clients' reproductive histories," said Jesse Cougle, the lead author of the study.

"Women struggling with unresolved issues related to a past abortion may benefit significantly from counseling that addresses this problem," said Cougle.

Abortion advocates have frequently asserted that carrying an unintended pregnancy to term is more emotionally harmful to women than abortion. But this new study linking abortion to general anxiety disorder comes on the heels of nearly a dozen other studies published in the last three years linking abortion to increased risk of depression, substance abuse, suicidal behavior and death from heart disease.

Because of the increasing concern about the mental health effects of abortion on women, legislation has been introduced in Congress to expand funding for treatment programs and research in this area.

In their examination of data, Cougle and his colleagues considered women to be at risk for GAD if they reported feeling worried and anxious for at least six months about things that were not serious or were unlikely to happen. They also had to experience other symptoms required for a diagnosis of GAD, such as irritability, fatigue, difficulty sleeping, a pounding or racing heart or feelings of unreality.

Researchers excluded women who reported having experienced a period of prolonged anxiety prior to or at the same time as their first pregnancy. Women who aborted a pregnancy after delivering their first pregnancy were also excluded from the study.

There were also greater differences in rates of generalized anxiety between aborting and delivering women who were under the age of 20 than there were for women who were older at the time of the pregnancy. This may be explained, researchers said, by other studies showing that older women are more likely to conceal past abortions in surveys and that abortion is a more stressful experience for younger women.

"Some studies have found that younger women are more likely to experience emotional distress following abortion than older women," said Cougle. "Younger women may feel less control over their decision and may abort under pressure from their parents and partner."

In 1968, Pope Paul VI issued his encyclical letter Humanae Vitae ("Human Life"), which reemphasized the church's teaching that it is always intrinsically wrong to use artificial birth control to prevent new human beings from coming into existence. Artificial birth control is "any action which, either in anticipation of the conjugal act [sexual intercourse], or in its accomplishment, or in the development of its natural consequences, proposes, whether as an end or as a means, to render procreation impossible" (Humanae Vitae 14). This includes sterilization, condoms and other barrier methods, spermicides, coitus interruptus (withdrawal method), the Pill, and all other methods of artificial contraception.

Nov. 21 is the feast of the Presentation of Mary. A church was built in Jerusalem in honor of this mystery. Although the feast at times disappeared from the calendar, in the 16th century it became a feast of the universal Church. Though unhistorical, Mary's presentation has an important theological purpose. It continues the impact of the feasts of the Immaculate Conception and of the birth of Mary. It emphasizes that the holiness conferred on Mary from the beginning of her life on earth continued through her early childhood and beyond.

Belmont Abbey monks honored during jubilee celebration

Fathers Kessinger, Oetgen and Baumstein mark 135 years

BELMONT — Hundreds attended Belmont Abbey's jubilee celebration as three members of its monastery celebrated anniversaries totaling 135 years of combined faith, dedication and service.

Members of the monastic community and their families, as well as faculty, administration and staff of Belmont Abbey College, commemorated the occasion with a special Mass and luncheon Oct. 24.

Benedictine Father David Kessinger celebrated 50 years professed as a member of Belmont Abbey. Over the years, Father Kessinger has made numerous contributions to not only fellow members of the monastery, but also to Belmont Abbey College and the greater community.

With a degree in library science, Father Kessinger maintained and developed the college's library holdings, serving as its librarian for a number of years. He has served as chaplain at Holy Angels Nursery and at Sacred Heart Convent, and continues to take special care of the perpetual adoration chapel on the college campus, and is advisor to the campus chapter of the Legion of Mary.

Benedictine Father John Oetgen celebrated 60 years. In the monastic community, Father Oetgen's confreres have consistently entrusted him with positions of influence and leadership.

Father Oetgen served as professor of English and speech at Belmont Abbey College, and has introduced generations of Abbey students to the beauties of Shakespeare. He has directed and performed in productions of the Abbey Players.

Additionally, Father Oetgen has also served as assistant dean of students, and was president of Belmont Abbey College from 1960 to 1964.

Benedictine Father Paschal Baumstein also took part in the jubilee celebration, marking 25 years ordained.

Father Baumstein has taught at Belmont Abbey College and enriched the lives of the monastic and college communities with his musical talent over the years. An avid patron of the Abbey Players, he has performed in several productions on the abbey stage.

Father Baumstein is a certified archivist and his considerable skill in this field has made a substantial and enduring contribution to Belmont Abbey. Organizing both the monastery and college archives, Father Baumstein published "My Lord of Belmont," a biography of Abbot-Bishop Leo Haid, the first abbot of Belmont Abbey and a significant figure in the history of the Catholic Church in North Carolina.

Father Baumstein also achieved the distinction of having the central portion of Belmont Abbey's campus placed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Founded in 1876, Belmont Abbey College consists of the college, monastery and Abbey Basilica. Nearly a thousand students representing more than 18 countries and 34 states call the abbey home.

Seven U.S. presidents on Thanksgiving

Gratitude is a way of life, not a day

In 1795, President George Washington (Episcopalian) asked the nation to observe a day of Thanksgiving.

He asked the people to gather in their churches and to humbly and fervently pray to God that he might prolong the blessings on this nation to us; to ask God to imprint in our hearts a deep and solemn sense of our obligation to him for the blessings. He closed his plea with these remarkable words: "And finally to impart all the blessings we possess, or ask for ourselves, to the whole family of humankind."

Abraham Lincoln (nondenominational, occasionally attended Presbyterian church) wrote: "I do, therefore, invite my fellow citizens in every part of the United States, those at sea, those sojourning in foreign lands to observe a day of thanksgiving and praise to our beneficent Father who dwelleth in the heavens."

Theodore Roosevelt (Dutch Reformed) declared: "We live in an easier time and in more plentiful times than our forefathers, the men who with rugged strength faced the rugged days; and yet, the dangers to national life are quite as great now as at any previous time in our history. It is fitting that we set apart a day for praise and thanksgiving to the Giver of Good."

Woodrow Wilson (Presbyterian) said: "In a spirit of devotion and stewardship we should give thanks in our hearts and dedicate ourselves to the service of God's merciful and loving purposes."

Franklin D. Roosevelt (Episcopalian) proclaimed: "To set aside in the autumn of each year a day which to give thanks to Almighty God for the blessings of life is a wise and reverent custom."

Harry S. Truman (Baptist) had this exhortation: "May we have the vision and courage to accept and discharge honorably the responsibilities inherent in our strength by consecrating ourselves to the attainment of a better world, and by offering thanks to God for the bounties vouchsafed us and by rededicating ourselves to the preservation of the blessings of liberty envisaged by our forefathers in the preamble of our Constitution."

Dwight Eisenhower (Presbyterian) expressed his view by saying: "As a nation much blessed, we feel impelled at harvest time to follow the tradition handed down by our Pilgrim Fathers of pausing from our labors for one day to render thanks to Almighty God for His bounties."

It seems to me that our presidents mention God frequently as a source of our thanksgiving and stress the importance of what we have accomplished. That's very good. True thanksgiving, however, takes shape in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican.

It is rather sobering to remember that the one person Jesus mentions as going up to the temple to give thanks is picked out, not for praise but for censure. The Pharisee began his prayer with words that are on countless lips at Thanksgiving time, "God, I thank Thee." Yet, he left the temple with divine disapproval.

Are we not guilty of thanking God that we are not like other people? Let us beware of our boasting. My understanding of Thanksgiving is not theology or anthropology; it is doxology and praxis. Gratitude is not a single act of kindness; it is a way of life. Thanksgiving sometimes may be filled with false pride, rather than true humility.

There is a story about a singer, well known in California, who was spending a few days of vacation with his wife and his four children in North Carolina. One of those days was rainy and they were tired of staying inside, so they decided to go to see a movie. When they arrived at the theater, the lights were on and there were about 10 people already seated. When the singer and his family appeared, all 10 jumped to their feet and applauded loudly.

The singer was thrilled to be recognized so far away from California. A man came over and shook his hand, and the singer said, "I am just amazed that you should recognize me so far away from home."

"Recognize you? I haven't a clue who you are," said the man. "All I know is that the manager of the movie house said he would not show the film unless six more people showed up."

For me, thanksgiving is being grateful and humble. What is thanksgiving for you?

Pope greets families of Italians killed in Iraq one

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II gave a special greeting to the families of the 19 Italians killed in Iraq a year ago when a car bomb exploded in an Italian military complex.

In his Nov. 17 general audience at the Vatican, he honored the 17 military personnel and two civilians "who lost their lives at An Nasiriyah while carrying out their mission of peace."

After the audience, the families greeted the pope and showed him the photographs of their sons, husbands, fathers or brothers who died when suicide attackers drove an explosives-laden vehicle into the Italian headquarters Nov. 12, 2003.

Pope John Paul looked with interest, grasped hands and touched the heads of the children.

Italy has some 2,700 troops in Iraq, the third-largest military presence, after the United States and England. The Italian government has said from the beginning of its engagement that theirs is a peacekeeping and not a combat mission.

In his talk at the audience, the pope said that the harvest and Thanksgiving period gives an opportunity for unity and overcoming divisions.

The phrase "the earth has yielded its fruits" from Psalm 67 was a hymn of praise to God "for the gifts of the earth" that unites "all men and women of every nation," the pope said.

The thanksgiving message means that "walls of hostility and hatred must be demolished so that the family of the children of God can gather in harmony around one table," he said.

The Good News vs. the news

Media coverage isn't always bad

A question came up again during a meeting at the chancery last week. I've heard it before in other meetings and in casual conversations with diocesan workers. "Why is the news media always so negative?"

Actually, I've been answering this question since I began working as a radio news reporter during my college years at East Carolina University in the 1970s. The quick answer is the familiar one: bad news sells. People have an endless fascination with the problems, conflicts, contradictions and failures that others suffer.

But there are a few things that we Catholics should keep in mind whenever we read or watch news accounts of church activity. Here's a short list.

It isn't all bad.

It may seem that reporters swim in a never-ending stream of bad news. But the opposite is true: much more good news than bad about the church is reported.

As a communications director for a public school system, I once tracked newspaper coverage for 18 months. During that time, 85 percent of stories reported about the schools were positive.

A quick review of coverage of the diocese shows a similar trend. Of course if you ask people their impressions of the public schools or the church, the negatives are always based on the few bad stories that are published.

It's nothing personal.

People often believe individual reporters and news organization are on a personal crusade to discredit them. That usually is not the case. News reporters deal with people in crisis all the time. After a while most reporters get used to the suspicion and anger that can come from people they are seeking to quote. It's not supposed to influence the neutral attitude they should have about the people they cover.

As a reporter, people often assumed that I was evil incarnate because they didn't like the story I was doing about their company or organization. I was threatened with lawsuits and physical beatings and once saw stars when I was punched on the chin by a relative of a suspect in a murder investigation. I never reported the altercation.

It will soon go away.

News organizations are always on the lookout for bad news. Once they find and report it, they are usually done and they move on. The sex abuse crisis in the Catholic Church is an excellent example of this.

In the weeks leading up to the February release of the John Jay Study, negative news stories were frequent and caustic. Once the exhaustive findings of the study were released, and it was obvious that the church was telling everything it knew about the last 50 years, the coverage at the national level subsided.

Individually, many dioceses are still dealing with the fallout from the crisis and that kind of coverage may seem endless. The Diocese of Charlotte has been fortunate with few scandal-related incidents and follow-up coverage has virtually disappeared.

Most reporters are more passionate about accuracy than they are about the woe their stories create; the best way to deal with them is to act professionally and to get any bad news out fast. The Diocese of Charlotte does this and enjoys relatively good news coverage as a result.

But the diocese can't change the spots on this leopard. We will always be cautious with what we say and will always offer the secular news media a Catholic perspective that will hopefully inspire the faithful and enlighten all others.

And the next time someone asks me why the news media is always so negative, I'm going to have a new answer. The church has cornered the market on the Good News and that doesn't leave the media with much else.

History's method of keeping track of the years

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. How did we determine to use the initials B.C. and A.D. for before Christ and after (Christ's) death? This couldn't have been the way people determined dates before Jesus was born. How did they keep track of years in those days? (Florida)

A. In Old Testament times and before that, the Jews, as most other cultures, usually based their calendars on a particular ruler or king ("in the 11th year of the reign of King Darius") or major events such as the Babylonian exile in the sixth century B.C. (Before Christ, in English).

The religious calendar in use by Jews today, supposedly based on the time from the creation of the world, began to be used only about 1,000 years ago. The "date" of creation was computed by adding up all the references to years and ages in the Hebrew Scriptures (our Old Testament), especially the book of Genesis.

Early Christians employed a variety of methods to record history. Some used local Greek calendars. Others followed the most common Roman method of dating events from the foundation of the city of Rome about 753 B.C.

Some Christians counted years from the supposed date of the birth of Abraham and still others from a program of taxation under Emperor Diocletian in the third century.

Our method of dating events from before or after the birth of our Lord came as a byproduct of attempts to settle the bitter controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches over the date of Easter. A Roman monk called Dionysius the Little invented this way of dating in the sixth century, using the designations B.C. and A.D. (Anno Domini, the year of the Lord).

Unfortunately many historical sources available to us today were unknown in his time. Using only the information at hand, he set the beginning of the Christian era, the birth of Christ, six or eight years later than it should have been.

Thus, the birth of Christ took place, according to our calendar, about the year 7 B.C.

Only centuries later was this new way of numbering years adopted even in the Christian world. The fact that it took hold at all is greatly due to the eighth-century English Benedictine monk and historian, St. Bede, who used this method of dating in his monumental "History of the English People" and other historical writings.

Thankful for what?

There are many people who might argue that we have less to be thankful for this Thanksgiving than in the past. It is not ingratitude on their part. Rather, it is the fact that present times contain so many uncertainties, tensions and fears.

A few years ago, we knew terrorists existed, but experiencing terrorism in our country hadn't hit home. Our freedom to move about was less hindered, and very little was heard about dirty bombs or chemical warfare. The Army was more interested in keeping the peace than fighting bloody battles, and it is no exaggeration to say that our minds and the environment were more at peace.

Before the last two presidential elections, we knew that Americans were divided, but not to the extent that we now know they are. Suddenly we realize how difficult it is to follow the motto that "in unity there is strength."

It was not until recently that we realized to what depths corruption can sink at the highest levels of the business world and the suffering this can cause millions of innocent people.

We were excited and proud about the new world of the Internet, only to learn that it has a dark side as well as a bright side. Computer viruses and identity theft are just two of the evils it has spawned.

Another motto dear to us has also come under fire: "The truth will make you free."

It is becoming more and more difficult to tell who is speaking the truth. Noted news stations have retracted statements they originally swore were the absolute truth. Respected analysts report that the truth espoused by aspiring politicians isn't always that truthful. Crafty lawyers and advisers have raised twisted truth to a new and dangerous art form.

Even some religious leaders, who symbolize the divine essence of truth, have been less than straightforward.

This is the tip of the iceberg of woes that makes us wonder what there is to be thankful for this Thanksgiving.

In life there are always two sides of a coin. Wherever there is woe there is also happiness. When we paraphrase the happiness of this Thanksgiving in terms of the Beatitudes, they teach us that:

—Happy are they who see imperfections in life as new, enervating challenges to be responded to rather than as hopeless woes to succumb to.

—Happy are they who are developing a new prudence to meet the challenges of our post-modern age.

—Happy are they who understand that war, untruthfulness, deceit and division are works of darkness that have existed from the beginning of time and who are formulating stronger virtues to counter them.

—Happy are they who are uneasy with unrest and seek new means of achieving peace.

—Happy are they who forever are turning to God and reinterpreting God's wisdom for our new age.

—Happy are all who keep the nation together with a steadfast spirit of faith, hope, love, prudence, understanding, fortitude and patience.

Ah, yes, as long as this spirit is alive, we have much for which to be thankful.

Christ the King Church overcomes obstacles to serve Cleveland County Catholics

A dedication Mass was held Nov. 9, 2004 at Christ the King Church in Kings Mountain to celebrate months of renovation and refurbishing.

KINGS MOUNTAIN — While history of a Catholic presence in the Cleveland County town of Shelby dates back to around 1884, it took until the mid-1930s for Mass to be regularly celebrated in local residents' homes. The first Catholic family in the Kings Mountain area, southeast of Shelby along Highway 74, is said to have settled there in the mid-1930s.

Today, parishioners of Christ the King Church in Kings Mountain can reflect on the evangelical spirit of their faithful predecessors that brought a Catholic church home.

For a quarter-century, Catholic families living in Kings Mountain had to travel to Shelby or Gastonia for Mass and catechetical instruction. As that number of families neared 20 by 1960, Father Thomas Clements, then-pastor of St. Mary Church in Shelby, began celebrating Mass in the Kings Mountain American Legion Hall.

The following year, Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh established an apos-tolitic center in town for training newly ordained priests. On the one-acre property stood the Associate Reform Presbyterian Church, along with other buildings to be used by the Catholic congregation for worship, educational and social purposes. A new Catholic parish was born.

With the acquisition of the property came almost immediate obstacles for the parish. The church buildings and other edifices, having been constructed decades earlier, were suffering from disrepair.

By 1965, the apostolic training center was relocated from Kings Mountain, and the church family reverted to mission status. Having sold what they could of the church structures in 1973, parishioners began searching for a new, permanent spiritual home.

gregations welcomed their Catholic neighbors to use their church facilities for Masses throughout the 1970s. With Bishop Michael J. Begley, shepherd of the newly established Diocese of Charlotte, the mission continued to search for a site on which to build a new church. Having petitioned St. Joseph since 1960, when sisters from the Mission Helpers of the Sacred Heart arrived to teach Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) classes, the congregation continued to call on the intercession of the Catholic Church's patron into the early 1980s.

On March 19, 1981 — the feast day of St. Joseph — four acres of land were purchased in town. Two decades earlier, a pair of Mission Helpers sisters had buried a medal of St. Joseph on that same piece of property, echoing the hope of local parishioners that a Catholic church would someday be built in Kings Mountain.

The congregation received financial assistance from the Catholic Extension Society, the diocese, parishioners and friends, and ground was broken for the new church in September 1982. Present at the ceremony were Father (now Msgr.) Felix Kelaher, pastor; and Rev. Gerald Weeks, former pastor of Resurrection Lutheran Church, where the Catholic mission has celebrated its liturgies for a time.

The first Mass in the new Christ the King Church was celebrated in July 1983. Forty-three families were registered as parishioners at the time. The church was dedicated on Nov. 29, 1983 — the feast day of Christ the King.

Much development occurred during the pastorate of Msgr. William Wellein, who arrived to minister in Shelby and the mission in Kings Mountain beginning in late 1984. The lower level of the facility was completed, thus allowing space for CCD classes and other catechetical and social activities. A wall hanging of Christ the King was placed on the large brick wall in the sanctuary. The pastor also added to the landscape a statue of Jesus, which he had obtained from a Wilmington movie studio while serving as pastor on the Carolina coast years earlier.

Father Carl Kaltreider became pastor of St. Mary and Christ the King churches in June 1996. Church life was soon highlighted by the presence of the Ladies Guild, various faith formation efforts, the parish council and Knights of Columbus joint council.

In October 1999, Father Eric Houseknecht became pastor of St. Mary and Christ the King churches. In 2004, he oversaw months of major renovations and refurbishing to correct structural and flooding damage. Upgrades were made throughout the church, including the addition of two new meeting rooms and a new reconciliation room.

On Nov. 9, 2004, Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated the renovated Christ the King Church.

The contemporary-style Christ the King Church continues to open its doors to resident and visiting faithful in Kings Mountain. Memories of the fervent missionary efforts of Cleveland County Catholics to establish a church on their eastern border remain strong. And somewhere in the surrounding soil, perhaps, still lies a medal of St. Joseph, the saint whose intercession was called upon in the hopes of establishing a new church.

Bishops end meeting early after votes on marriage, unity, abuse data

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Finishing up their business a day earlier than originally scheduled, the U.S. bishops concluded their fall general meeting in Washington Nov. 17 with a flurry of votes on a national catechism for adults, a multiyear pastoral initiative on marriage and a historic decision to join a national ecumenical forum.

On a busy final day of their Nov. 15-17 meeting, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops also voted to gather annual information about new sex abuse accusations against Catholic clergy and other church workers; approved three Spanish-language liturgical changes; and accepted a proposal to streamline the 2005 diocesan audits on sex abuse matters.

But a three-page report from the bishops' Task Force on Catholic Bishops and Catholic Politicians — originally scheduled for public discussion by the conference — was presented in written form without comment

Sacred imagination means using such devices as metaphor to image how the sacred is at work in one's life.

"We are shaped by the metaphors that we choose," Diane Lampitt said. "We're shaped by the words that we employ."

GREENSBORO — Thanking the Knights of Columbus for their hard work over the last 100 years, Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin also called upon them to recommit themselves for the future.

"Today is not just a thanksgiving; let's make this a time of consecration for the years yet to come," he said.

Bishop Curlin, state chaplain to the Knights of Columbus, was the homilist during a Mass honoring the 100-year anniversary of Piedmont Council 939 at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro Nov. 13.

The Mass, concelebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and other priests, was followed by a dinner party at a local hotel, where the council received a 100-year award from David Onofrio, Knights of Columbus

'WALKING MIRACLE'

Elka Franco, a parishioner at St. John the Baptist Cathedral in Paterson, N.J., pulls her wheeled book bag to class at Mary Help of Christians Academy in North Haledon, N.J. The 14-year-old girl had a brain aneurysm July 3 and was in a coma for four days. She is now back attending classes.

New Jersey Catholic girl recovers from coma, says faith helped her

NORTH HALEDON, N.J. (CNS) — After being unable to speak for several weeks, 14-year-old Elka Franco shocked everyone by laughing.

Though the laughter was faint, it was music to her mother's ears.

"The laugh was very quiet and soft, but it was something," said Blanca Franco, Elka's mother, recalling her daughter's recovery four weeks after she suffered a massive brain aneurysm in July.

"Someone told a joke. After that, Elka couldn't stop laughing," Blanca said.

The outcome could have been much worse. Initially, Elka was in a coma for four days. Her doctors feared she could die and told family members to wait and pray.

Today, after countless hours of physical, occupational and speech therapies, the teen-age girl has regained most of her lost motor functions.

In September, she started her freshman year at Mary Help of Christians Academy in North Haledon. Although she started school slightly later than the rest of her class, she was ahead of the schedule her doctors predicted.

And as she gets around to her classes, the aneurysm's effects are barely noticeable except for a slight limp.

"I'm walking faster now," she said, but she added that she is still slower than her classmates when it comes to taking notes in class.

Salesian Sister Margaret Wilhelm, the school's principal, describes Elka as a "walking miracle."

Her brush with death happened suddenly when she went swimming with family and friends. She became extremely ill and had to be rushed to the hospital.

Msgr. Mark Giordani, rector of St. John the Baptist Cathedral in Paterson, hurried to the hospital to see his parishioner — Elka is an altar server at the cathedral. She also sings and plays guitar at Masses and is involved in a small faith community.

"I was in shock. It was unbelievable," Msgr. Giordani said. "Elka is a remarkable, intelligent and responsible girl who wants to serve Mass and loves helping people, especially the poor. She's so full of energy, and all of a sudden, she's lying in a hospital bed, motionless."

Elka returned home in late August and she continues to undergo physical, occupational and speech therapies. She is playing her guitar and hoping to get back to hip-hop dancing lessons.

Above all, she has a new outlook. As she puts it: "I want to thank God for giving me another chance at life."

Catholic school students on hand as Bush spares life of turkey

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Students at Immaculate Conception School in Northeast Washington had a rare opportunity to watch in person as President George W. Bush issued a pardon to stop a scheduled execution.

In ceremonies at the White House Rose Garden Nov. 17, Bush issued an executive pardon to Biscuits, the national Thanksgiving turkey presented to him by the National Turkey Federation.

With the action, Biscuits was guaranteed to live out his life at Frying Pan Park in Virginia.

Immaculate Conception students were the only students in the nation invited to the ceremony. After pardoning Biscuits, Bush shook hands with the students and posed for pictures with them.

Bush offered a special greeting to the students, calling them his "special guests" and praising the school and parish for distributing food to the needy in their community.

"This is the 40th year Immaculate Conception has provided food baskets to families in the Shaw neighborhood, to make sure they have plenty to eat for their Thanksgiving dinner," Bush said. "For the sake of our feathered guests, I'm not going to elaborate on the contents of those baskets."

During the ceremony, Bush reminded his guests that this was an election year, joking that Biscuits won a "neck-and-neck" vote to earn the title of national Thanksgiving turkey.

"It came down to a few battleground states. It was a tough contest, and it turned out some 527 organizations got involved, including Barnyard Animals for Truth," the president teased. "There was a scurrilous film that came out, 'Fahrenheit 375 Degrees at 10 Minutes Per Pound.' Now, it's a time for healing."

Bush also reminded Americans that Thanksgiving Day is set aside to honor and thank God.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says Christians, Muslims Jews say God calls people to love

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The heart of the message proclaimed by Christians, Muslims and Jews is that God calls all people to follow the path of love and justice, Pope John Paul II said.

"May God help us follow this path with perseverance and patience," the pope said at a Nov. 18 audience with eight religious leaders from Azerbaijan.

The Muslim, Jewish and Christian leaders — led by Sheik Allahshurkur Pashazade, Azerbaijan's leading cleric — came to the Vatican to thank the pope for his 2002 visit to Azerbaijan.

The pope praised Sheik Pashazade as a man who has worked "to build peace in a region where, unfortunately, violent conflicts continue."

And he praised the country's tiny Jewish community for giving witness to the possibilities of "coexistence and fraternal collaboration" in a country where more than 93 percent of the people are Muslim.

Only about 300 Catholics live in the country of 8 million people.

Pope John Paul said he hoped the visit of the religious leaders would be a sign for the world that "tolerance is possible and is a civil value that lays the basis for wider human, civil and social development."

"No one has the right to present or use religions as an instrument of intolerance or as a means of aggression, violence and death," he said.

"On the contrary," the pope said, "their friendship and mutual esteem, if also supported by a commitment to tolerance by those who govern, is a rich resource for authentic progress and peace."

Gay marriage proposals destructive to society, Vatican official says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Instituting forms of gay marriage does not help homosexuals and is "destructive for the family and for society," Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger said.

Cardinal Ratzinger said recent legislative proposals for gay marriage are part of a larger modern rupture between sexuality and fertility. They mark a radical departure from the conviction that the union between a man and a woman guarantees the future of humanity, he said.

Cardinal Ratzinger, head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, made his comments Nov. 19 in the Rome newspaper La Repubblica.

The interview dealt primarily with Europe, where several countries have moved toward recognizing gay marriage.

Cardinal Ratzinger said this is a trend that "separates us from all the great cultures of humanity, which have always recognized the particular significance of sexuality: that a man and a woman are created to jointly be the guarantee of the future of humanity, a guarantee that is not only physical but also moral."

The cardinal said the church should have "great respect" for homosexuals as people who "are suffering and want to find their way to live justly." But creating forms of gay marriage "does not really help these people," he said.

Gay marriage legislation has an effect that goes beyond the homosexual population, Cardinal Ratzinger said. It promotes the idea that, because they may be legal, all such unions are morally acceptable, he said.

The cardinal said gay marriage proposals were just one example of the tremendous changes challenging European culture.

Cardinal Ratzinger said that despite worrisome signs of a decline in religion in Europe he was confident that "the faith is not dead" on the continent.

"I am sure that even in the context of a multicultural society, and even with these great disputes, the Christian faith will remain an important factor, capable of furnishing moral and cultural strength to the continent," he said.

Adoring Christ

Father Roger Arnsperger, pastor of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, and Deacon Patrick Vallandingham take part in the 40-hour eucharistic adoration at Sacred Heart Church. Father Arnsperger led the devotion, which began Nov. 17 and ended with a eucharistic procession led by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and other diocesan priests Nov. 19.

The devotion was in celebration of Pope John Paul II's Oct. 17 declaration of the Year of the Eucharist, which runs through Oct. 29, 2005. The pope has asked Catholics to spend time during the year in adoration before Christ, present in the Blessed Sacrament.

Eucharistic adoration also was one of the initiatives suggested in "The Year of the Eucharist: Suggestions and Proposals," recently released by the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments to help dioceses and parishes promote the yearlong celebration.

Catholic Daughters gather for annual celebration

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Daughters of the Americas Court Charlotte 1199 remembers the past and looks toward the future.

Approximately 25 members of the court celebrated Catholic Daughters of the Americas Day Oct. 17 with a Mass and luncheon.

The Mass, celebrated by Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte, was to honor deceased and present members. The day's theme was "Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow — Women of Faith and Vision."

Catholic Daughters of the Americas Day is held the third Sunday of October. The organization, which was founded in 1903 as the Daughters of Isabella, describes itself as the oldest and largest organization of Catholic women in the Americas.

Headquartered in New York with 100,000 members in the United States, Guam, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, Dominican Republic and Mexico, Catholic Daughters' purpose is to help the church in its religious, charitable and educational works.

Some of Court Charlotte 1199's community projects include A Child's Place, Regional AIDS Interfaith Network, Crop Walk, tutoring and work with battered women.

WANT MORE INFO?

The Catholic Daughters is open to Catholic lay and religious women 18 years of age or older. Court Charlotte 1199 meetings are held at 11 a.m. the second Saturday each month at the Knights of Columbus Hall, 220 E Kingston Ave., Charlotte.

PRAYING FOR LIFE

Night of prayer for life to be held in parishes around diocese

CHARLOTTE — The National Night of Prayer for Life will be held in 14 parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte Dec. 8-9.

The event is a pro-life prayer service consisting of exposition and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, recitation of the rosary, silent meditation and benediction.

"On this evening, we assemble to ask God's help and forgiveness for sins against our most vulnerable brothers and sisters — the unborn," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life Office.

Parishes typically begin the service at 9 p.m. on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8, and continue until 1 a.m. on Dec. 9, when Our Lady of Guadalupe appeared to St. Juan Diego in Mexico. The "hour of unity" is midnight-1 a.m., so all parishes in the four U.S. time zones can be linked in prayer at the same time.

However, due to unique schedules and conditions, some parishes may adjust the schedule of the service.

WANT TO GO?

The National Night of Prayer for Life runs 9 p.m., Dec. 8, until 1 a.m., Dec. 9. However, times may vary for participating churches. Please call the church for the schedule.

Knights celebrate 100 years in Greensboro

Bishop Curlin reflected on how different things were in the country in 1904 when the council was first founded.

"We've had many advances and achievements over 100 years, yet we still have so many sorrows in this world," said Bishop Curlin. "But rather than be pessimistic, we should look at opportunities to bring Christ where Christ is needed."

"What a glorious time for the Knights of Columbus to stand out and shine as examples of what Christians should be," he said.

An international service organization founded in 1882 by Father

Michael McGivney in New Haven, Conn., the Knights of Columbus is open to all males 18 years of age or older who are faithful and practicing Catholics.

Activities of the Knights include camps and schools for underprivileged children and aid to the handicapped and orphaned, the sick and disabled. The Knights are also well known for efforts the support of strong marriages and families, vocations and the pro-life movement.

On June 7, 1903, the first Knights of Columbus council in North Carolina, 770, was formed in Charlotte. Next came Piedmont Council 939, first known as Greensboro Council, which was organized through the efforts of Benedictine Father Vincent Taylor, then-pastor of St. Benedict Church in Greensboro, and Otto Parati — both members of the Knights of Columbus.

Early in 1904, they signed up six men from Greensboro who were responsible for recruiting enough members to initiate the Greensboro council. The council was founded with 40 charter members on Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 24, 1904.

"At a time when Catholicism was looked down upon, these men started a council, marched in parades and showed pride in their faith," said Pat Kirwan, a fourth-degree knight and past Faithful Navigator. He has been a Knight for 26 years.

"I'm proud to be a part of this," he said.

The council's name was changed to Piedmont Council 939 on Feb. 8, 1921.

"We've seen it grow over the years," said Bob Grabasky, a 16-year member serving as the Knights' state secretary. "We used to meet in a store, and now we have 470 members."

Grabasky believes the council has made a difference over the years.

"We have a lot to offer. People in the community realize there are Catholics here doing some real good," he said.

And he said serving as a knight has made a difference in his own life.

"It's made me a better husband, a better father and a better Catholic," he said.

The council has helped make life better for others, as well.

"Through Operation LAMB, we have raised a total of $670,000 for mentally handicapped children," said Frank Tamborino, the council's grand knight and member for seven years.

According to recently released national figures, the nearly 1.7 million members of the Knights of Columbus contributed a record $130 million to charity in 2003. The number of service hours contributed by Knights also was at an all-time high at 61 million hours in 2003.

"It's great to give something back to the church and community," said Tambino. "And it's a milestone to celbrate 100 years of service."

Bishop Curlin highlighted some of the council's works during his homily.

"Think of all you have done ... all the sacrifices you've made to make a difference," he said. "We thank God for what you've done to respond to those challenges."

"But we can't stay focused on the past. The challenge for us is to make this a day of rededication," he said. "What a time for the Knights to stand up and recommit themselves. We must make a new consecration."

"From now on as a Knight of Columbus, with all the challenges our world gives you, say adsum domine — I am here, Lord," said Bishop Curlin.

'SpongeBob' splashes into theaters with positive message

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Everyone's favorite bright-yellow sea sponge makes a splash on the big screen in the animated underwater adventure "The SpongeBob SquarePants Movie."

Based on the hugely popular TV cartoon, the wacky and whimsically appealing film uses much of the show's original voice talent and remains true to the series' light-hearted, kid-friendly tone.

OK, so it is like watching an extended episode — at times, overextended — but as its tag line proudly proclaims, the movie version is "bigger, better and more absorbent." On the second count, opinions will vary.

Unless you've been holed up in a hermit-crab shell for the past few years, you probably already know that SpongeBob is an incurably optimistic little sea sponge, who lives in a pineapple house in the backwater cove of Bikini Bottom, where he works as a fry cook at Krusty Krab's fish joint.

In the film, the porous protagonist and his dimwitted starfish pal, Patrick, must undertake a perilous quest to recover King Neptune's crown which was stolen by Plankton, a microscopic megalomaniac who uses the theft to set in motion his diabolical master plan to subjugate all of Bikini Bottom.

Along the way, SpongeBob and Patrick wiggle out of some close scrapes with deep sea monsters and a hired hit man, aided in their efforts by Neptune's kind-hearted daughter, Mindy.

Compared to the computer-generated seascapes of "Finding Nemo" and the marine metropolis of "Shark Tale," the eye-poppingly colorful, hand-drawn "SpongeBob" has a much zanier absurdist look — more nonsensical than nautical.

The movie features several catchy, plot-padding tunes. Mixed in with the animation are several live-action sequences, including a rousing opening number sung by a shipload of pirates.

Loyal fans — many of whom are adults — will go home happy, and even those not particularly fond of the spunky sponge may find themselves cracking a smile.

Parents should be aware that the film contains one scene where SpongeBob and Patrick are captured and roasted under a sunlamp, which may prove a upsetting for very young children. Also, viewers catch a glimpse of both SpongeBob's and Patrick's bare bottoms, which only the crustiest of Krusty Krabs would find offensive.

As in the TV show, the clever humor is never mean-spirited and refreshingly cynicism-free. Underneath its looney-tune silliness is a positive believe-in-yourself message that extols the virtues of childhood. In a world where kids grow up way too fast, it's nice to see a movie that actually celebrates innocence. Not a bad lesson to absorb.

In spite of a few scenes of menace and some mildly crude humor, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-I — general patronage. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

DiCerto is on the staff of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: DEC. 5, 2004

Dec. 5, Second Sunday of Advent

Cycle A Readings:

- 1) Isaiah 11:1-10
Psalm 72:2, 7-8, 12-13, 17
- 2) Romans 15:4-9
- 3) Gospel: Matthew 3:1-12

ADVENT IS A TIME FOR HOPE

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Advent is a season of hope and high expectation, with expectations as high as the Isaiah reading's picture of the peaceable kingdom, shown in images of a calf and a young lion browsing together, or a cow and a bear living as neighbors. But as Psalm 72 and Isaiah's reading show, it is a season of waiting on the justice of God to come to all the nations, of the virtuous receiving their rewards and the crooked their just desserts, of God coming to the aid of the poor and afflicted.

John the Baptist puts it so angrily in the Matthew reading when he sees the unjust religious who make life difficult for others: "Who told you to flee the wrath to come?" You can just see the fire and brimstone sparking from his bearded lips.

But we all want to opt for the peaceable version of what is coming from God in the future. We want to be presentable at the time of God's coming, to be among those comfortable with the seeming paradox of animals normally opposed being at peace; of the poor man being treated with justice.

By the time this appears, I will likely know whether I face a second procedure involving surgeons working skillfully inside my skull. My first brain surgery last November was quite successful, as witnessed by the fact that I'm writing this column. If a second angiogram reveals that surgery is necessary again, I can only hope for the grace of God to allow me to be present to my family and my friends once again, with all of my faculties.

But whatever the outcome, I can trust in the eternal vision we are presented in these readings, confident that the grace of God is adequate to overcome the inadequacies of my own lacks in obedience and love. And as one of the gentiles Paul writes of in Romans, I will be able to "glorify God because of his mercy."

Questions:

What lessons might facing your own mortality teach you about how you want to live? If you thought you might be heading to God soon, to whom would you want to show more of the love you hold in your heart?

Bishops vote on marriage, unity, abuse data or discussion, at the suggestion of Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, who heads the task force.

The report said the bishops would develop a "Reader on Catholics in Public Life" and that their doctrine and pastoral practices committees have agreed to take up the matter of church teaching on when it is proper for Catholic politicians, and all Catholics, to receive Communion.

The 456-page "U.S. Catholic Catechism for Adults," approved by a 218-10 vote, was written in response to a Vatican request that bishops or bishops' conferences develop such catechisms to complement the universal "Catechism of the Catholic Church" issued in 1992 by Pope John Paul II.

The adult catechism must receive "recognitio," or confirmation, from the Holy See before it becomes official.

The marriage initiative, approved by a 195-20 vote, will begin with a survey of bishops about the issues they want addressed, followed by a symposium of theologians and social scientists, focus groups of lay people and sessions with pastoral leaders and bishops' conference committees, and lead to a pastoral letter on marriage in 2007.

"We can help to create a positive climate that places healthy marriages at the heart of strong families, a strong nation and a strong and holy church," said Bishop J. Kevin Boland of Savannah, Ga., chairman of the Committee on Marriage and Family Life. "This is a pastoral moment we should seize upon."

The proposal to join Christian Churches Together in the USA, which passed 151-73, marks the first time that the U.S. Catholic Church will be a partner church in such a national ecumenical body, although Catholic churches in about 70 other countries belong to national councils of churches or similar bodies.

Bishop Stephen E. Blaire of Stockton, Calif., chairman of the Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, called the new organization "a forum for participation" through which Christian churches can "pray together, grow in understanding together and witness together."

The bishops also took up two proposals related to their "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People." The gathering of annual data from dioceses was approved by a 137-85 vote, while a related proposal allowing for fewer on-site inspections and more self-reporting in diocesan audits passed by a vote of 189-35.

The Spanish-language liturgical texts approved Nov. 17 were designed to formally incorporate important Latin American rituals into U.S. church services.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., smiles after being elected the next president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington Nov. 15. Bishop Skylstad was vice president of the conference.

These include a blessing ceremony for the "quinceanera," a popular celebration among Hispanics that takes place when a girl is 15 to mark her passage from childhood to adolescence; an infant baptismal rite; and additions to the marriage liturgy that incorporate traditions popular mostly in Mexico, Central America and Puerto Rico.

The bishops overwhelmingly approved a series of recommendations aimed at limiting the conference's projects to those mandated by the Vatican or the bishops themselves.

The conference "has taken on too many projects. We try to do too much," said Bishop Donald W. Wuerl of Pittsburgh, chairman of the bishops' Task Force on Activities and Resources, which drafted the recommendations.

On Nov. 15, the bishops approved a $129.4 million budget for 2005 — 1.8 percent higher than the previous year's budget — and agreed to create an ad hoc committee to aid the church in Africa, which would collect and distribute contributions for the church in Africa, using staff and resources from a handful of offices to manage the effort.

Bishop William S. Skylstad of Spokane, Wash., was elected to a three-year term as the new USCCB president, and Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago was elected vice president.

Bishop Skylstad, who served as USCCB vice president under Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., took up his new post at the close of the meeting.

In the meeting's closing press conference Nov. 17, Bishop Skylstad said the past three years have been "a tough time for bishops" because of the clergy sex abuse crisis, but he said the bishops now wished to give greater time and attention to such matters as evangelization, catechesis, the sacraments and Mass attendance.

"We need to address those issues, rather than just processing documents," he said.

Opening the meeting with the traditional president's address, Bishop Gregory called the clergy sex abuse crisis "the greatest scandal that the church in the United States perhaps has ever confronted," but he cited several "very healthy forces" that have resulted from the bishops' handling of the scandal.

Those forces include an evaluation of how the bishops' meetings themselves work, and a study of how their conference operates and how its expenses might be held down, he said.

"As I look at these three forces at work, I am drawn to conclude that the conference as we know it today is likely to be a much different conference five or 10 years from now," Bishop Gregory added.

The bishops closed the first day of their meeting with a Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception marking the 25th anniversary of their pastoral letter on racism, "Brothers and Sisters to Us."

The bishops also authorized Bishop Gregory to issue a statement on their behalf calling on the United States and the international community to provide sufficient support to the African Union to stop the violence in western Sudan's Darfur region.

MAKING A DIFFERENCE

Students volunteer weekly at shelter

HIGH POINT — Every Wednesday, four middle school students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School spend their lunch period serving food, not eating it.

The students work at a neighborhood shelter's kitchen run by Open Door Ministries of High Point Inc., as part of the school's Community Outreach Program.

Immaculate Heart of Mary School was the first to create a student volunteer partnership with Open Door. Now 10 years old, the project gives students the opportunity to experience a different aspect of life. Other area schools also donate their students' manpower.

This year at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, one sixth-grader, one seventh-grader and two eighth-grade students — and a parent volunteer — don plastic gloves every week to "plate-up" as many as 100 trays of food. The trays are distributed to men, women and children — many of whom are homeless.

Students also wash and dry pots and pans, and clean tables.

"This form of outreach is one of many ways our school gives back to the community," said Principal Wanda Garrett.

"Children who develop good habits of volunteerism are the very ones who grow up and continue to serve as adults," she said. "To practice our faith in action and instill in our students the value of being good stewards of all God has given us is a lesson that can only be taught outside the classroom."

To teach the student body more about the Open Door shelter and pantry, Immaculate Heart of Mary hosted a talk by Steve Key, director of Open Door, Nov. 19. Key explained what the shelter does, for whom and why.

Key's talk kicked off a canned food drive at Immaculate Heart of Mary school and church to replenish Open Door's pantry. Students delivered the food to Open Door Nov. 23.

Retreat focuses on faith

Lampitt opened her Fire in the Mountains 2004 talks on "Sacred Imagination" by quoting St. Hildegard: "Listen: there was once a king sitting on his throne. ... Then it pleased the king to raise a small feather from the ground, and he commanded it to fly. The feather flew, not because of anything in itself but because the air bore it along. Thus am I, a feather on the breath of God."

Fire in the Mountains 2004, a one-day annual retreat sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte's Asheville and Smoky Mountain vicariates and Office of Faith Formation, and by Harcourt Religion Publishers (which publishes only Catholic materials), was held Nov. 20.

Nearly 200 people from parishes in the Asheville, Smoky Mountain, Hickory, Gastonia and Winston-Salem vicariates attended.

Lampitt, president of Harcourt and author of "Imagination: Fuel for Catechesis," spoke to the English-language audience in the Harrell Center.

Dora Tobar, Ph.D., presented to the Spanish-speaking audience in Lambuth Inn. She is co-founder of and former professor at Instituto Lumen Gentium in her native Colombia and now teaches summer courses at Catholic University of America.

In his opening remarks, Father James Hawker, vicar for education for the Diocese of Charlotte, talked of a man who swims in polluted streams to call attention to the pollution. The swimmer said that, "If someone isn't willing to put his life on the line, nothing changes."

"Every time you speak in the name of Jesus, you put your life on the line and things change, you change" Father Hawker said. "You echo the word of Jesus, and that word reverberates into the lives of people — their hearts, their minds, their souls."

Father Hawker encouraged people to not "get downhearted when you experience rejection."

Tobar spoke on "I am the Church." "To be church is to be a community person," she said.

God, she added, has been working inside her "since I was conceived in my mother. We are the result of the breath of the Holy Spirit."

Just as stem cells can be anything in people's bodies, Tobar said, people can be anything in the body of Christ.

"Our job by the Holy Spirit is to build the new body of Christ, to give the love of Christ to the whole world," she said. "We are stem cells because we can bring God-life to humanity. Each (person) is a stem cell in the body of Christ for humanity."

People recognize their places in the body of Christ, Tobar explained, by looking at individual abilities and by looking at "what kind of pain in the world touches you much. God is always talking to you through the suffering of his people."

"What (Tobar) has been talking about touches all the ministries in the vicariate: youth groups, community, catechists," said Antonio Garcia, Asheville Vicariate Hispanic ministry coordinator. "The message is clear about where God is calling you."

Lampitt sees imagination as crucial to faith growth.

Indeed, the "Catechism of the Catholic Church" states: "Meditation engages thought, imagination, emotion and desire. This mobilization of faculties is necessary in order to deepen our convictions of faith, prompt the conversion of our heart, and strengthen our will to follow Christ" (2708).

Meditating on stories from one's life or from books can help people gain fresh insights, said Lampitt.

"Stories shock us into a new awareness," she said. "Sometimes stories are so familiar that we don't see them anymore. This can be true of Scripture. So we need to find new eyes to see with."

To meditate on a story, Lampitt advises rereading a story, then asking: "How does the story speak to you? How is God's revelation communicated through this story? In what ways does this story touch your heart and motivate you to change? What Scripture passages come to mind in relationship to this story?"

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Thanksgiving gets a thumbs-up from me

So this Thanksgiving found me sitting by the fireplace, warming my bones with the help of a Cuban cigar and a glass of fine Australian brandy, contemplating the many things for which I have to be thankful.

I realized I have quite the list of things to treasure — my annual big game safari in Africa, my lucrative foot modeling career, my stint as a women's beach volleyball coach. Oh, and my family.

But noticing the scar on my right thumb, I realized that perhaps most precious to me is one particular thumb-shaped award that adorns the far corner of my upstairs trophy room. I acquired it long ago, during a period of my life when I was embroiled in a shadowy world unknown to most.

That's right, you guessed it — I was a reigning champion in the infamous, much-rumored but largely secretive New York underground thumb-wrestling circuit. Or, as we in the know call it: Thumb Wars.

Many folks have experienced the joys of victory and the oft-painful agonies of defeat in amateur thumb wrestling — two players hook the four fingers of their right hands together so both of their right thumbs are sticking straight up. The object is to pin down for three seconds your opponent's right thumb using your right thumb.

This is often played in situations where larger or more complicated games might be inappropriate: in the car, a restaurant or when attempting to annoy one's parents. It's usually good clean fun and not to be taken seriously, even by those with a tendency to talk about silly things with a straight face.

But Thumb Wars is quite real, and unlike the glorified sport of professional Rock, Paper, Scissors tournaments, it is something most decent people can't imagine.

I was first lured into this dark world as a young man in New York. I was playfully thumb wrestling with a girl at a bar one night and, when she went to the ladies room, I was approached by a surly-looking man.

"You're good, kid, but you can be better," he said gruffly. "And you'll never know until you're pushed to the limit. Want to find out how far that is?"

He slipped me a piece of paper with directions and a password on it. Being young and naive, I soon found myself outside an abandoned warehouse down by the harbor. I knocked, gave the password to the bouncer and was led to a smoke-filled room. Two men were seated at a table under a bright light; dozens of others were around them, shouting and exchanging bets and money.

The rules were simple: Two men enter the circle. Two men leave, of course, but often one with a bruised thumb.

The wrestlers finished their match, and one was removed on a stretcher while nursing a sprained thumb. Onlookers cheered and jeered. The referee called for a challenger. The surly man appeared and pushed me into the circle.

Murray's Musings

The crowd went wild.

I was up against Tony "Green Thumb" Famiglietti, a retired gardener and current champ. I sat across from him, and we locked fingers. His digits were gigantic and I feared the worst. But a bell rang suddenly and all bedlam broke loose.

He almost pinned my thumb twice, but I had youth and speed on my side. Suddenly, I was in a tight spot.

"He's trying to 'slide' you, kid," said the surly man. "Watch out!"

A slide is when your opponent tries to slip his thumb up behind yours and pin you. I panicked and swirled my thumb out of the way; somehow, I slipped it around and pinned his. The sound of my thumb hitting his made a distinct "thwack" sound. I had won.

The crowd roared. The surly man grinned at me. "You done good, kid. You done real good."

That should have been it, but I was hooked. It was in my blood. I found myself in that circle weekend after weekend, wrestling all sorts of assorted foes, with Surly Man as my manager. The "Thwack Attack Kid," they called me. And I was unbeatable.

With my success came fame, money and women. By day I was an average college student; by night, I was a champion. I thumb wrestled in the backrooms of bars, liquor stores and police stations all over New York and New Jersey. I even participated in tag team events, known as "Massive Multiplayer Thumb Wrestling."

While the notoriety was great, I realize now how it changed me. Like many underground thumb wrestlers, I lost sight of what really matters in this world. I wasted my prayers on winning matches. I danced in the darkness, shunning the light.

Thankfully, my "glory days" eventually came to an end. I suffered that most common of accidents — someone dropped a marching band tonal bass drum on my hand and injured my thumb — and my underground career as a champion "thumb warrior" was finished.

It wasn't easy to accept at first, but alas, it was for the best. Leaving that world behind only made me appreciate how important my faith is to me, and how good it felt to be out of the darkness. If anything, that's why I treasure that silly-looking thumb-shaped trophy.

Nowadays, I enjoy simpler pleasures and it doesn't take much to make me grateful — just a stout Cuban cigar and some stiff Australian brandy.

Oh, and my family.

Pope says every Catholic has duty to evangelize in contemporary world

Editor's note: Due to an early publishing schedule, we are unable to print the story from the pope's weekly general audience.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — On the 40th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's pronouncement on the nature and role of the church, Pope John Paul II said every Catholic has a duty to evangelize the contemporary world.

The recently published "Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church" offers a useful tool to lay men and women who want to implement Vatican II's teachings in modern society, he said.

The pope made the remarks at a noon blessing Nov. 21 from his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square.

The pope said Vatican II had wanted to emphasize Christ as "the light of peoples," or "Lumen Gentium," the title given to the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, which was issued Nov. 21, 1964. It presented the church as a mystery, as a communion of baptized believers, as the people of God, and as a pilgrim moving toward fulfillment in heaven but marked on earth with a real, though imperfect, sanctity.

"Lumen Gentium" marked a milestone in the church's progress along the road of contemporary society," the pope said.

"It stimulated the people of God to assume with greater decisiveness their responsibilities in the building up of that kingdom of God that will have its fulfillment only beyond history," he said.

"Evangelical animation of the temporal order is, in fact, a duty of every baptized person, in particular of the lay faithful," he said.

The pope said the church's efforts in the world need the support of prayer. In that regard, religious orders deserve the spiritual and material assistance of the whole church, he said.

In the United States, USCCB Publishing plans to have the social compendium available in mid- to late January.

Scorn is hard to take

As a night owl, I developed the habit of watching "The Tonight Show" monologue before I went to bed. It was nice to go to bed with a laugh.

For a long time Johnny Carson was an electronic friend. After he retired, I soon began to enjoy Jay Leno. He was not as gentle as Carson, but he could be very funny.

But I watch him no more. A few weeks ago he started on a series of jokes about priests and child abuse.

Leno is free to tell whatever jokes he wants. I also realize that we priests have nobody but ourselves to blame for the fact that we have become the butt of jokes. Comedians, after all, make a living pointing out life's ironies. After the scandal of the last few years, we are an easy target.

However, I don't have to listen. I am free to turn it off. From now on I will.

I don't want to watch or listen when the vocation to which I have dedicated my life is made an object of scorn. It is just too painful. There is a meanness to these jokes.

In one joke about childhood obesity statistics, Leno said the real danger of child obesity was that the altar boys were now too fat to run away from the priests. In another joke about the presidential election he said: "Never mind the separation of church and state, what about separating the church from our kids. That's what we ought to be worried about."

Whew! Scorn is hard to take.

The priesthood is in trouble when people are laughing at it. Anger, even hatred, is easier to take than scorn. We have a lot of repair work to do.

Like a lot of comedians, Leno is a fallen-away Catholic. There are many others including George Carlin and Bill Maher. Their jokes are angry. Their anger tells me something: In some way, the priesthood and the church are still important to them. That's why they are so angry about it.

Cynics often are disappointed romantics. But both cynicism and romanticism are immature.

Mature people eventually come to realize the truth of what the church has always taught about the human condition — that original sin affects everyone. We all have feet of clay. All are sinners.

It is not entirely their fault if they are cynics about the priesthood and the church. Priests tended to "widen their phylacteries," as Jesus said. That is, we tended to project the image of perfect virtue. We did not admit our mistakes easily or our sinfulness publicly. After the last few years it is painfully obvious.

But there is one thing about those who left the church in anger. The porch light is on for them. At the end of life, even folks like these bitter comedians will want comfort and consolation.

Despite their scorn, a priest will be there for them. We bring words of encouragement and forgiveness if they want it. That is what we do. We serve him who offered himself up for those who jeered and mocked him.

Meanwhile, I will be turning the television off a little earlier. I will get more sleep, but I will miss the laughs.

Statistics and complications that were someone's daughter

PROVIDING NAMES PUTS FACES TO TRAGEDY

This time, the I-told-you-so catches in the throat.

The death of a young person produces a terrible void. Who can be indifferent to the loss of a unique human being and her capacity to love, create and do good? Who could be insensitive to the raw grief of family members and count the death as nothing more than a statistical blip?

Apparently the folks at Danco Laboratories can.

Danco, the U.S. distributor of RU-486 (Mifeprex), seems quite willing to overlook another death so long as it can keep selling the "magic pill" to make pregnancy disappear. And if the pregnant mothers disappear too, well that's just "a rare complication."

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) is acting no better. On Nov. 15, the FDA decided not to suspend distribution of RU-486 even after the seventh reported death in recent years associated with an RU-486 abortion, after 676 "adverse event" reports including 17 ectopic pregnancies, 72 cases where blood transfusions were needed and 7 serious infections. Instead, it's content to beef up the warning labels and belatedly include emergency room directors in their mass mailing because — go figure — lots of teens and young women who take RU-486 end up in emergency rooms.

Responsible medical associations and the pro-life community have warned the FDA for nearly a decade about the dangers inherent in the RU-486/misoprostol combination. Citizens petitions were filed with the FDA both during and after its dubious fast-tracked approval in the waning months of the Bill Clinton presidency.

There are three main ways that RU-486 is potentially lethal to women: bleeding to death, infection and ruptured ectopic pregnancy. Why? Because the pills always cause bleeding and pain which can mask potentially fatal problems.

We can now put names to these risks.

In June 2003, Rebecca Tell Berg, a Swedish teen, bled to death. She didn't go to the hospital because she was told to expect to bleed for two weeks. Dr. Mark Louviere narrowly saved the life of a woman from Waterloo, Iowa who'd lost one-half to two-thirds of her blood volume after an RU-486 abortion.

Eighteen-year-old Holly Patterson of Livermore, Calif., died in September 2003 from an infection following an RU-486 abortion. A Canadian woman died in September 2001 from infection, her death suspending the Canadian RU-486 drug trials. The most recent U.S. victim also died from an RU-486-related infection.

Brenda Vise of Hamilton County, Tenn., died in September 2001 from a ruptured ectopic pregnancy after undergoing an RU-486 abortion. Because RU-486 is ineffective in ending such pregnancies, they are supposed to be ruled out in advance.

Dana Powell of Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, was luckier: after taking RU-486 in October 2002, a ruptured ectopic pregnancy destroyed one fallopian tube, but she survived.

There are many such stories among the 676 adverse event reports filed with the FDA. In November 2003, Congressmen Jim DeMint and Roscoe Bartlett and Senator Rick Santorum introduced bills ("Holly's Law") to suspend FDA approval of RU-486 pending review of its safety. If the FDA cannot be relied upon to protect young women from this dangerous and unnecessary drug, Congress should step in and do so.

That famous half a grilled cheese sandwich

Uncle Dan

DAN MORRIS
CNS COLUMNIST

By the time you read this, chances are that both you and I will have missed out not only on a chance to have purchased on eBay half a grilled cheese sandwich with a purported image of the Virgin Mary on it, but also a Pop Tart with an image of the Virgin Mary.

As I write this, the bidding for the grilled cheese sandwich is hovering somewhere between $22,000 and eBay's maximum bid of $99.9 million. EBay was quite forthright in admitting that some of the $99.9 million bids might not have been serious.

The price on the Pop Tart had reached $4.25 — but there were still two days and four hours left for bidding, so heaven knows how high it might have climbed.

Unfortunately for the Pop Tart seller, the grilled cheese item made international news and, thus, was dominating the auction.

Still, the Pop Tart person did not seem discouraged at all. As a matter of fact, he or she made the important point that the Pop Tart had not even been toasted yet, and "unlike 10-year-old grilled cheese sandwiches, this Pop Tart comes without a bite taken from it."

"Maybe you want to add to your collection of food that resembles biblical characters, or maybe you're just looking for a good bite to eat. Either way, this Pop Tart is a must have," the seller said on the eBay listing. (This is all true.)

Diana Duyser, who owns the famous half a grilled cheese sandwich, said the personal relic has been perched on her bedroom nightstand for about a decade, surrounded by cotton balls inside a clear-plastic box.

No news reports I saw indicated whether or not she had submitted the sandwich to church authorities for any type of authentication — or to any health officials for comments.

For the record, I saw a picture of the Pop Tart on eBay. It very much resembles a wood-burning project I did in the third grade, only it features a bad rendition of the Virgin Mary rather than a horse with a huge head.

Yes, I know what you parish stewardship committee people are thinking. EBay auctioning of images of church heroes and heroines on food items might have great potential for fund raising.

That might be more than a half-baked idea.

Comments are welcome. E-mail Uncle Dan at cnsuncle01@yahoo.com.

A divided people Americans must search for full truth

Who would have thought that millions of Americans would split so evenly in our elections? How do we interpret this division?

By nature, we members of the human family live on assurances, beliefs and certitudes. But truths, beliefs and traditions have been shaken in our culture. I wonder if stronger stances are being taken today both by those who want to maintain traditions and by those who want to redefine them.

What are some cultural issues that now divide people?

Most Americans were in favor of hunting down the 9-11 terrorists. But when the Iraq war was added to the hunt, they split on its justification. Is our nation fighting terrorism or are we enkindling it?

Some Americans feel that being American means allowing important traditions to be redefined. Hence, citizens in more and more states are being asked to vote on the issue of same-sex marriage. Do we redefine marriage and justify this as upholding fundamental rights or do we maintain its present definition as unchangeable?

Although big business always has experienced its share of corruption, being a CEO was considered an honorable position. Recent scandals have dramatically changed this perception. Should we act urgently to create laws designed to prevent corruption in business or should we act cautiously, not wanting to make life more complicated than it is?

The news media over the years generally were considered anchors of truth. Unfortunately, errors in reporting now have spread a cloud of skepticism over the media. Do we call for government action in this area or do we leave the media to reform itself?

No doubt both the right and left in America argue they represent the truth. Those on the right might say that fundamental truths, beliefs and traditions must remain. The certitude they provide is necessary for our lives.

Those on the left might say that truths, beliefs and traditions always are being adapted to new realities. For a nation to respond to the needs of its people, it must be willing to adapt in major ways.

The fight over who has truth on their side is as old as history. How many people on both sides of a war have died believing that they were dying for the truth? What is disconcerting about the present split in America is that an understanding of truth is being lost.

It is not that we don't know truth when we see it. Rather, we aren't taking time, reflection and prayer to sort through the complexities of our times in order to uncover the full truth.

Living at a time of great uncertainty may have the effect of stampeding Americans, leading them to bypass the difficult task of finding the full truth.

When I was young, I was often in a state of confusion and uncertainty. My mother, sensing this, urged me to ask God to help me slow down. It is a prayer that all Americans need to make their own.

We have to take time to learn the truth. Once found, it has the power to dispel confusion and unite us.

ANGELIC CARVINGS

Sculptor carves three angels out of dying trees at Kansas cemetery

BY SUSAN McSPADDEN AND JOE BOLLIG

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BASEHOR, Kan. — Usually when a tree dies, no matter how venerable, it becomes wood chips or is used for a bonfire.

But three dying Norway pines more than a century old at Holy Angels Cemetery in Basehor were saved from that fate.

"They were the oldest and prettiest trees in the cemetery, and we wanted to hold onto them somehow," said Joyce Bolan, secretary at Holy Angels Church, which includes the cemetery.

For a solution, the parish sought angelic intervention — and they got it.

Russell Ehart, a native of Springdale and sometime resident of Kansas and New York, was commissioned to carve the 10-foot trunks that remained of the trees into angel sculptures.

"I used to tell people, 'I'll carve anything you want,' until I got some strange requests," the sculptor said. "Now it's: 'I'll carve anything reasonable.'"

Angels are certainly in the "reasonable" category. Ehart has carved all sorts of things, from the Jayhawk mascot of the University of Kansas to St. Francis of Assisi. He doesn't do abstract art.

"I at least attempt to make (sculptures) look realistic," said Ehart, whose wife is also a woodcarver.

He used to work in construction, roughing in houses, but a back injury ended that and he turned to carving. He started with hand-carving in 1995, and then began carving with a chain saw five years later.

His first chain-saw piece was of "Chief Tonganoxie," in the Kansas town that bears the chief's name and where Ehart went to school.

Today, Ehart's work can be found across the United States and as far away as South America and Germany. His most unusual piece is one of his rare relief sculptures called "Ezekiel's Vision," done on the side of a tree trunk at a Topeka residence. Ezekiel is at the center with his arms draped around two cherubs.

The piece Ehart spent the most time working on was a bust of civil rights leader the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. He put about 500 hours into hand-carving the sculpture, including one stretch of working 23 hours straight. After that particularly grueling session, he said he asked his wife how it looked.

"About the same, except it's three hat sizes smaller now," she said.

Ehart's King bust won best of show at an exhibition in Utica, N.Y., in 2003.

Although he won't spend nearly that amount of time on Basehor's three angel sculptures, he is sure the results will still be impressive. When they are completed, one sculpture will depict an angel holding a lantern; the second, an angel praying; and the third, a cherub.

The cherub will be dedicated as a monument to unborn victims of abortion.

Ehart has already started carving the angels, using small chain saws that weigh about 14 pounds when full of fuel. The saws are equipped with a special blade called a "carving bar," which will be used for the main work. He also files the blades for more control.

As he completes each sculpture, Ehart will use a polyurethane sealer on the wood for protection, so that the angels can guard the cemetery for years to come.

The Parish Profile will return.

Father John Barkemeyer, pastor of St. Cajetan Church in Chicago, hugs his mother, Germaine, as she and his father, Henry, bring up the offertory gifts during the priest's farewell Mass Nov. 7. Father Barkemeyer had to report for duty as an Army chaplain in Baghdad, Iraq, Nov. 13.

Chicago parish offers prayers as pastor reports for duty in Iraq

CHICAGO (CNS) — Two months after completing his Army chaplaincy training, Father John H. Barkemeyer headed to Baghdad, Iraq.

Father Barkemeyer, pastor of Chicago's St. Cajetan Church, said his rapid deployment demonstrated the urgent need for Catholic priests to serve men and women in the U.S. military.

"They say they need at least 300 Catholic priests, and they've got about 100," he said.

The 40-year-old priest received his orders Nov. 3 to report for duty 10 days later. A farewell Mass for him was celebrated at his church Nov. 7.

"When I was in training, I was impressed with the commitment the Army showed to meeting the religious needs of the soldiers," he said before he was deployed. "They do the best they can with the resources they have."

Father Barkemeyer spent his last few days in the parish making sure the staff and associate pastor were ready to carry on in his absence, and taking care of personal details, such as getting a dental X-ray just in case he is killed in action and it is needed to identify his remains.

The Chicago pastor had been part of the 863rd Engineering Unit, an Army Reserve unit out of Darien, Ill. But the need for Catholic chaplains was so great that he was sent to Iraq as an "individual replacement." His orders were to report to a headquarters unit in Baghdad.

But he did not really know what awaited him. Before leaving, he said he was most nervous about adapting to military life.

"I want to meet the needs of the soldiers as effectively as I can," he said. "I'm very confident in my ability to minister and to connect with the soldiers — I've been ordained 14 years. But I've got to learn the Army way of doing things."

Father Barkemeyer first approached Chicago Cardinal Francis E. George about becoming a military chaplain last spring, as the initial invasion of Iraq began to transform into an occupation facing hostile insurgents. A priest cannot serve in the military without his bishop's permission.

"I looked at the sacrifice we were asking our young people to make," he said. "A lot of our kids from St. Cajetan were in the Army or the Marines, and a lot of them were in Iraq. They have a right to the sacraments."

Less aid, economic woes said to hamper poor nations' development

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Archbishop Celestino Migliore, Vatican nuncio to the United Nations, said Nov. 23 that some countries were making encouraging progress toward development goals set by the Millennium Summit but the poorest were not.

"Scarce economic aid and international economic conditions have not allowed the poorest countries to achieve the most important targets in education, health and access to water and sanitation," he said.

At the 2000 summit at the United Nations, world leaders declared that they would seek to reduce the number of people living in poverty by half, provide universal education, promote gender equality and achieve other "millennium development goals" by the year 2015.

Archbishop Migliore, speaking to a session of the U.N. General Assembly that was reviewing the progress, said the amount of development aid provided by donor countries fell far below the 0.7 percent of national income that had been widely accepted as a reasonable guideline.

Much of the aid that donor countries do give is "not targeted at the fundamental needs of the poorest countries," he added.

Noting that the poorest countries were mostly found in Africa, the nuncio said the ability of those countries to earn money by exporting goods was diminished by the policies of wealthier countries that subsidize their own exports and impose tariffs on those of Africa.

Archbishop Migliore called on the United Nations to help overcome such problems by urging the wealthy countries "to implement better the commitments they have made in international forums."

He suggested the world body itself needs to make changes to act effectively.

"Enlightened leadership" from the United Nations will involve "playing down unproductive rivalries and competitions between agencies," he said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Advent good time to rediscover importance of Sunday Mass, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II encouraged Catholics to rediscover the importance of Sunday Mass during the Advent season.

The period before Christmas is a perfect time to reflect on "the meaning of Sunday, its 'mystery,' the value of its celebration, and its significance for Christian and human existence," the pope said during a noontime talk from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square Nov. 28, the first Sunday of Advent.

The pope said a rekindling of interest in Sunday Mass was essential for the church, especially during the current year dedicated to the Eucharist.

In the Mass, he said, the church recognizes Christ as "the center of history" and finds in his loving sacrifice the ultimate meaning of the mystery of the faith.

The papal remarks were occasioned by the start of preparations for an Italian eucharistic congress in 2005; its theme will be the importance of Sunday Mass.

Pope asks religious to continue serving poor in face of injustice

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II asked members of religious orders to continue to serve the world's poorest and neediest in the face of "unheard-of" forms of injustice and exploitation.

He made the remarks to more than 800 participants of the first International Congress on Consecrated Life in Rome Nov. 22-28.

"Throughout the centuries, love for others, especially the most defenseless, the young and children, and those who have lost the sense of life and feel rejected by everyone, has inspired consecrated men and women to give of themselves without reserve," the pope said.

"Continue to offer yourselves for the world, always aware that the only measure of love is to love without measure," he said.

The pope said the modern world needs religious men and women more than ever. Members of religious orders need to show contemporary society that the sacrifice of one's own goals and projects in the service of the Gospel is a source of real happiness, he said.

They also need to offer the credible witness of Christian values to a society that often seems disoriented, he said.

The pope said contemporary society often does not leave space for unselfish expressions of love. That increases the responsibility of religious to serve those in need, to "bind every wound" and to respond to spiritual needs wherever they present themselves, he said.

Undermining family causes 'deep wound' to society, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Those who undermine the fundamental role of the family cause "a deep wound to society" that is often impossible to repair, Pope John Paul II said.

In an apparent reference to laws being passed in many Western countries that expand the definitions of family, the pope said the protection and promotion of traditional marriage and families by the church is a matter of "exceptional urgency."

The pope gave his warning in a Nov. 20 audience with the Pontifical Council for the Family at the conclusion of its three-day plenary assembly at the Vatican.

The pope and other church leaders repeatedly have been calling attention to what they see as the cultural and legal erosion of the established concept of marriage between a man and a woman under way in many developed countries.

"The family based on marriage is a natural and irreplaceable institution and is the fundamental element of the common good of every society," Pope John Paul said.

"Those who destroy this fundamental fabric of human society, not respecting its identity and distorting its role, cause a deep wound to society which often provokes irreparable damage," he said.

The council, he said, must address changes to the status of the family at the national and international levels.

The church opposes legislation that permits same-sex marriage or gives legal status to cohabiting couples.

The pope gave a special nod to young couples, urging the members of the council to "renew your efforts to foster young families."

Young couples, likewise, should "cordially accept and intelligently value the discreet, delicate and generous help of other couples," he said.

The theme of the plenary session was "The Mission of Mature and Experienced Couples Toward Betrothed and Young Couples." Council members are clergy, Vatican officials and lay Catholics, including several married couples from around the world.

Maronite Catholics asked to register with census

Data will help Maronite eparchies with outreach, communication

NEW YORK — The Maronite Catholic bishops of the United States have initiated a Maronite census and they are asking all Maronites to register.

"The Maronite Synod of Bishops has called us to take up a census for our Maronite people here in the United States," said a Nov. 8 letter issued by Bishop Gregory J. Mansour of St. Maron of Brooklyn Eparchy and Bishop Robert J. Shaheen of Our Lady of Lebanon of Los Angeles Eparchy.

The request stems from years of war in Lebanon and the fleeing of Christians to other countries in search of better lives, said the bishops.

"Many of them have become active and productive members in the Latin Church; others live near a Maronite church and are registered there; and still others are in need of connecting with their Catholic heritage," said the bishops.

The census will not only make the Maronite bishops aware of Maronite Catholics, but also help the local Maronite parishes with better outreach and communication within their areas.

"We hope to be able to reach out to Maronite Catholics wherever they are in the United States and to assist them to be better Catholics and Maronites," said the bishops.

The Catholic Church is comprised of 22 autonomous churches, with the familiar Latin or Roman rite as the "western" church; the remaining churches are "Oriental" or eastern in origin. All the churches use language and prayers that are unique to their history and culture, but all churches observe the same sacraments.

Although some Catholics in the Middle East are members of the Latin rite, most are members of the Catholic eastern churches.

WANT TO REGISTER?

To register with the Maronite census online, go to www.maronitecensus.net; or call (718) 237-9913 or (314) 231-1021 to receive a census form by mail. For more information, e-mail the census office at usa@maronitecensus.net.

St. Ann parishioner profiled in 'Who's Who'

CHARLOTTE — Macedonio Ruiz, a parishioner of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, is profiled in the 2004 editions of "Who's Who in America" and "Who's Who in Science and Engineering."

Ruiz, a native of Tamazula Jalisco, Mexico, graduated from the University of Guadalajara. He is a board certified entomologist from the Entomological Society of America, a former agricultural pest control advisor in California and a licensed pest management professional in North Carolina.

Ruiz has been a parishioner of St. Ann Church for 11 years and serves as a children's catechist. He appears in the October 2004 edition of "Who's Who in America" and the December

2004 edition of "Who's Who in Science and Engineering."

"Who's Who in America" has provided concise biographies of notable Americans for more than 100 years. Founder Albert Nelson Marquis selected 8,602 distinguished people for the first edition in 1899; since then, the Marquis Who's Who directories have grown to include biographies of millions of leaders and achievers from around the world in every significant field of endeavor.

Boy Scouts earn Eagle ranks

WINSTON-SALEM — Tyler Hollett and Chance Tara of Boy Scout Troop 958 received their Eagle Scout ranks Oct. 16.

To be eligible for the Eagle rank, Scouts must earn 21 merit badges, perform service projects of significant value to their communities and complete other requirements listed in the Scout Handbook before turning 18 years of age.

Tyler's project involved building a nature trail for the Children's Home of Winston-Salem. Chance completed a nature sanctuary and trail for Bolton Elementary School in Winston-Salem.

Both Tyler and Chance are honor students at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School, parishioners of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem and members of the Order of the Arrow, Scouting's national honor society.

Tyler has also received the Boy Scout Ad Altare Dei Award (the Catholic God and Country award).

end St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York Dec. 12, the feast day of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Included among more than 60 stops along the torch's 3,813-mile journey were St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point.

By the trip's end, more than 27,000 people will have carried the torch along with a reproduction of the Guadalupe image and a portrait of St. Juan Diego.

Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church, and Father John F. Starczewski, parochial vicar, celebrated Mass following the arrival of the torch and its contingent. A fiesta was held following Mass.

The Mass highlighted the history of Our Lady of Guadalupe, one of the most revered saints in Latin America and the patron saint of the Americas, including Mexico.

St. Juan Diego, the 16th-century Indian in Mexico who saw the visions of Our Lady of Guadalupe on Tepeyac hill in 1531, was canonized July 31, 2002.

The torch run began in 2001 as a way to unite people separated by the border between the United States and Mexico and to promote friendship among communities in both countries. The event is sponsored by the Tepeyac Association of New York, a nonprofit agency uniting the efforts of 40 community organizations serving immigrants from Mexico.

Mother Teresa's successor makes brief stop in Charlotte

Sister Nirmala visits convent, talks with clergy

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Following in the footsteps of her predecessor, Blessed Mother Teresa, Sister Nirmala Joshi came to Charlotte Nov. 5.

The superior general of the Missionaries of Charity was in the diocese for a brief visit to the sisters of her order who reside in Charlotte's Cherry neighborhood.

Mother Teresa of Calcutta, India, who founded the Missionaries of Charity in 1950, visited Charlotte in June 1995, establishing the order's first North Carolina convent. The visit fulfilled a promise to her friend of 25 years, then-Bishop William G. Curlin, who blessed the convent during Mother Teresa's stay.

Four Missionaries of Charity sisters, along with their mother general, remained in Charlotte.

A Hindu convert to Catholicism, Sister Nirmala was born in 1934 in India's eastern Bihar state to a family of the priestly Brahmin caste. She joined the Missionaries of Charity at age 24. She was elected superior of the order in March 1997, six months before Mother Teresa died.

Sister Nirmala first arrived in the United States after attending the 48th International Eucharistic Congress in Guadalajara, Mexico, in October. In addition to her Charlotte stop, she visited members of her order ministering in the Chicago, Detroit, New Mexico, Denver and San Francisco areas.

Dressed in her order's distinctive white sari trimmed with blue stripes and wearing thin rubber flip-flop sandals, Sister Nirmala's 90-minute visit to the convent brought together members of her order from Kentucky and Georgia, as well as priests of the Diocese of Charlotte, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Bishop Emeritus Curlin; Vincentian Father Joseph Elzi, parochial vicar of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Charlotte; and Father Peter Tan Van Le, pastor of St. Joseph Vietnamese Church in Charlotte; and laity of the diocese.

Missionaries of Charity sisters minister at both churches:

"I was delighted to welcome her to our diocese," said Bishop Jugis, "and assure her of our complete happiness with the work of the Missionaries of Charity in our city."

"I was pleased that Bishop Curlin, who first invited the Missionaries of Charity to open a house in Charlotte, was also present to be a part of the welcoming festivities," he said.

Visiting the Archdiocese of Denver Nov. 8, Sister Nirmala echoed her predecessor's constant refrain about the "poorest of the poor."

"He comes to us in the poorest of poor as the hungry one, the thirsty one, the homeless one, the lonely one, the unloved and unwanted one, the sick and the dying one," Sister Nirmala said, "to give us the opportunity to satiate his hunger and thirst for our love."

After a Mass, attendees asked Sister Nirmala what message she most wanted people to take home.

"Love one another," she said. "Remember, God loves us tenderly and wants us to do the same."

A first Thanksgiving

ESL teacher Susan Jassen asks her Somali and Montagnard students about what they are thankful for as the class prepares for their first Thanksgiving in the United States Nov. 23. The most common answer: "freedom."

cution and a future that is bright in the United States.

The group usually gathers to learn English, but the English as a Second Language class is a bit different Nov. 23. After the lesson, the students celebrated their first Thanksgiving in the United States.

Teacher Sue Jassen, of the diocesan Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office, taught a lesson focusing on the holiday.

"We are all here together to eat, to celebrate and to give thanks," she said. "What are we thankful for?"

A Bantu woman said her life in Somalia was rough, with no food and no school for the children.

"We came here and now we are Americans. Our children go to school," she said. "America is very, very nice, a free country."

There are nods of agreement all around the room.

The Bantu are a minority clan in Somalia whose persecution includes confiscation of their lands and denial of some basic rights. Although Somalia has received international aid over the last decade, a U.N. relief agency reports that the aid is withheld from the Bantu people, who lack food, shelter and education for their children.

The CSS Refugee Resettlement Office

settled 122 Bantu people in the Diocese of Charlotte in 2004. Since the refugee resettlement program began in 1975, more than 8,000 refugees from 23 countries have found homes in the diocese.

The Montagnards (a French word for mountain dweller and pronounced "mountainyards" in English) are Christians who have lived for centuries in the Central Highlands of Vietnam. They aided U.S. Special Forces during the 1960s, and many became prisoners in re-education camps after the Vietnam War ended. Hundreds have settled in Charlotte since the mid-1970s.

In the apartment's small kitchen, dinner awaited the students. Unlike other community meals where outsiders bring food, the students supplied the fare for this meal.

Jassen told them to bring their favorite foods. The table is piled high with Doritos, fresh fruit, a pizza and Krispy Kreme doughnuts. The closest thing to a turkey is some Kentucky Fried Chicken.

There is one native dish, a beef and rice mixture pronounced "barese," prepared by Fapuma Hassan, 28. In Somalia, she said, goat or camel would have been substituted for the stew beef and bones.

"I miss it," she said, referring to the camel meat.

On the stairs of the two-story apartment, 23-year-old Wau Ksor, a Montagnard, enjoys his first Thanksgiving dinner. There is plenty of food, but Ksor, like the others, has not adopted the American custom of loading a plate to the breaking point. His feast is made up of some orange slices, grapes, chips and a chicken wing.

He is happy and talkative. "I like freedom in America," he said in broken English. "There is much food in America."

Ksor worked as a lumberjack in Vietnam cutting trees that were used to build houses. He now works as a janitor at a Charlotte hotel. He left the city of Pleiku because of religious persecution.

With a look of sadness he tells the story of his church, which he claims was blown up by the South Vietnamese opposing the spread of the Christian faith. The bombing convinced him to leave Vietnam and, while he is happy in the United States, he misses his father and sisters back in Pleiku.

As he eats his Thanksgiving chips, his expression has the familiar look of someone who is enjoying a satisfying meal. In broken English, he gives thanks for what he has.

"There is freedom in America, there is food, there is everything," he said.

David Hains is director of communications for the Diocese of Charlotte.

BIRTHDAY GIRL

Basilica parishioner turns 100

Alice Wynhoff reflects on century of memories

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Alice Marguerite Wynhoff was born on Nov. 14, 1904, four years before Henry Ford released the Model T.

Although she has outlived her siblings and most of her friends, more than 40 guests — nieces and nephews, neighbors, caregivers and former coworkers — attended her 100th birthday party in Asheville Nov. 14.

Wynhoff's fellow parishioners at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville signed a three-foot high birthday card, which Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor, presented to her along with a special blessing.

"I never expected to live to 100," said Wynhoff, sitting on her couch with her faithful companion, Gigi, a black poodle, snuggled next to her.

Asked her advice on living 100 years, Wynhoff responded with a laugh and said, "Oh, I wouldn't recommend it. You can't do anything."

"It's difficult for someone who was as active as I was to just sit around," she said. "I used to ice skate in the park on the pond in the winter and play tennis in the summer."

She excelled at tennis. Nearby in the bookcase, her name is engraved on a silver trophy, her first place win for the Daughters of Isabelle tournament in 1929.

"Now I have to get used to that thing," she said, pointing to her cane. "My doctor insists I use it around the house, so I'm trying."

Born when Theodore Roosevelt was president, Wynhoff has lived through 18 presidential administrations. Woodrow Wilson is the first president she clearly remembers.

Wynhoff attended St. Thomas Aquinas School in Milwaukee, where Dominican nuns instructed her.

"The head nun was very strict. Actually, they all were, but we learned," said Wynhoff.

She attended a public high school because the Catholic high school was too far from her home. She worked as a bookkeeper at a local store before attending the University of Wisconsin at Madison, what she described as the most enjoyable years of her life.

"I did well enough in school and didn't have to worry," she recalled. "It was fun but a lot of work, too."

Alice Marguerite Wynhoff sits with her poodle, Gigi, at her home in Asheville. Wynhoff, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence, celebrated her 100th birthday Nov. 14.

After earning a bachelor's degree in English and history, Wynhoff taught fourth and fifth grades for four years before resigning to care for her ill mother until her death.

She can still remember attending downtown festivities with her father the day after World War I ended in November 1918; and a certain notorious gangster in the "roaring 1920s."

"I remember Al 'Scarface' Capone," she said. "Milwaukee is close to Chicago, so we were conscious of what he was doing and followed the news closely."

Wynhoff can also recall the despair of the Depression.

"The Depression was really bad. I had to stand in line for bread and potatoes and certain other foods," she said. "It was not a pleasant feeling, standing in those lines and feeling as if I'd never again get to earn a living."

"I decided that if I ever got to earn money again, I'd save a lot and never have to go through that again," she said.

In 1939, Wynhoff went to work for the U.S. government on the 1940 census.

"We used punch cards during the census," she said. "Then the government needed someone who knew about punch cards to work in the weather bureau."

After working in Pittsburgh, New York, New Orleans and Washington, D.C., Wynhoff moved to Asheville in 1951 to work as a climatologist for the Air Weather Service Bureau, having trained in that field at Tulane University in New Orleans.

She retired after 30 years, and now lives at home with the help of several caregivers.

Over the years, Wynhoff has been an active parishioner of Basilica of St. Lawrence and its Altar Society. She attended Mass until 2003; now Gail Carroll, her homebound minister, brings her a church bulletin and the Eucharist each week.

Although she has no time for television during the day, she often watches it at night.

"I used to watch Johnny Carson. I sure miss him. He was good," she said. "Now, I'm happy to be in a rut. I have enough to keep busy."

ST. PATRICK STUDENTS UNVEIL MURAL AROUND CONSTRUCTION SITE

CHARLOTTE — Students at St. Patrick School are helping to make their community a little more colorful.

The school unveiled a 320-foot mural as part of a joint community project with Summit Properties Nov. 23.

A Summit Properties representative approached the kindergarten-through-fifth-grade school with the idea of creating a colorful perimeter around the nearby construction area in Charlotte's Dilworth neighborhood, where the developer is building new apartments.

The student project, themed "Growing Together," involved students painting artwork on 40 large boards under the direction art teacher Lisa Underwood. Each of St. Patrick School's 290 students has at least one brush stroke on the mural.

"The message I'd like to convey to my students, via this co-op project, is that when we communicate our life experiences through visual arts, the impact can be strong and very moving," said Underwood.

"The simple yet profound mural theme of 'Growing Together' is an ideal example of this message," she said. "We have experienced growth by doing the project. We've bonded and already feel a positive effect."

Before the unveiling, students attended Mass in St. Patrick Cathedral. A police escort accompanied the students, teachers, parents and Father Paul Gary, rector, to the construction site two blocks away, where Principal Angela Montague thanked the students, parent volunteers and Underwood for their efforts.

Students then released 290 green and white balloons before returning to school.

"Collectively, we've produced something that hopefully many people will enjoy," said Underwood. "This project should be a wonderful memory for all involved."

DECIDING VOTES

Catholic students experience campaigning, voting

WINSTON-SALEM — Students at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem recently got an in-depth look at voting.

The entire student body was involved in an election simulation that began in September and culminated with October debates and mock voting on Election Day, Nov. 2.

Kindergarten, first and second grades were in charge of the election celebration. They baked cookies and created buttons for students to wear after they voted.

Third-graders studied past presidents and their home states. They created PowerPoint presentations and a picture book based on their research.

The fourth grade researched presidents and reported "presidential trivia" each morning in September and October, and published an election newsletter for the students' families.

Fifth-graders acted as the Board of Election, deciding many things, from the size of posters to the voting age.

The middle-school students researched the candidates, created and presented commercials and debated the issues.

Catholic high schooler receives scholarship to Boise university

KERNERSVILLE — Courtney Marie Achter, a senior at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, has received a full athletic scholarship to attend Boise State University in Idaho in fall 2005.

Achter, a local gymnastics standout, is one of five high school seniors in five states to sign national letters-of-intent to attend Boise State University and compete on the school's gymnastics team in 2005-06. She plans to focus on physical therapy or special education at the Idaho university.

"She is a talented local gymnast with great technique," said Sam Sandmire, Boise State head coach. "We know her potential and are excited to have her join our team."

A member of the High Point Gymnastics Academy Team since 1994, Achter is a 10-time state qualifier, seven-time regional qualifier and three-time national qualifier. In the 2004 Junior Olympic Nationals, she placed ninth in bars and 16th in the all-around competition.

"Courtney has great technique and clean lines on every event," said Sandmire.

Achter has remained on the Bishop McGuinness Principal's List during her time in high school, and was selected for the National Honor Society and Who's Who Among American High School Students this year. She is also a four-year member of her high school's Student Ambassador program and Spanish Club.

Achter and her family are longtime members of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, where she has been involved in the youth ministry and Vacation Bible School programs. She also has served as "team buddy" for Special Olympics and as a volunteer for the Adams Farm Community Association Recreation Committee for three years.

Charlotte Catholic honors alumni

CHARLOTTE — Charlotte Catholic High School's Alumni Association recently held its seventh annual Sports Hall of Fame induction ceremony and presented its Distinguished Alumni Award.

The ceremony took place during halftime of the varsity football game between Charlotte Catholic and Mount Pleasant High School Oct. 29.

The Sports Hall of Fame inductees, selected because of their outstanding athletic achievements at Charlotte Catholic, were John Cassels (class of 1960), Chris Kouri (class of 1988) and Mike Melvin (class of 1993).

The Distinguished Alumni Award, presented to a Charlotte Catholic graduate who has demonstrated excellence throughout his or her life and represents the ideals of Charlotte Catholic, was awarded to Debbie Stathakis (class of 1979).

Charlotte Catholic honored as football team of the year

CHARLOTTE — Charlotte Catholic High School's football team was recently named recipient of the Charlotte Regional Sports Commission's 2004 High School Football Team of the Year Award.

The award, presented to a Charlotte-area team that best exemplifies the characteristics of hard work, dedication, perseverance and sportsmanship, will be given during the annual Charlotte Touchdown Club's "Bronko Nagurki Trophy Award Dinner" in Charlotte Dec. 6.

"The Charlotte Sports Commission takes great pride in bestowing this award," said Michael Mistler, the commission's director of operations. "The Charlotte Catholic football team, in achieving remarkable success this year, certainly exudes these qualities."

Previous winners of the award are A.L. Brown-Kannapolis (1997), Vance (1998), Butler (1999), Independence (2000, 2002), Piedmont (2001) and Charlotte Latin (2003) high schools.

The Charlotte Sports Commission brings sporting events to Charlotte that benefit the region in economic impact and quality of life. Additionally, the commission attracts conferences, sports organizations and teams to the Charlotte market.

ONE LAST KISS OF YOUR LIFETIME

"LAST KISS" by Rich Staley

"'Last Kiss' by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. 'Last Kiss' is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Books suitable for Christmas gift-giving

REVIEWED BY BARB FRAZE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The following children's books are suitable for Christmas giving.

"My Little Sister Hugged an Ape," by Bill Grossman, illustrated by Kevin Hawkes.

"My little sister hugged an ape," a bug, and some strange animal for every letter of the alphabet. This book is more than an alphabet book, it is rhyming fun at its best.

Hawkes' colorful illustrations of the wide-eyed sister hugging — or being hugged by — one animal after another add hilarity to a great story that includes just enough slightly gross stuff to appeal even to children who do not like to read or be read to. Ages 6-9.

"The Librarian of Basra: A True Story from Iraq," by Jeanette Winter.

This is a true story of heroism from Iraq. Alia Muhammad Baker is the librarian in the Iraqi city of Basra. As war approached, she became worried about the fate of the library's 30,000 books. Before the library burned in the war, she moved the books to a neighboring restaurant for protection. Then she carted home the books, filling her house and some friends' houses.

Winter's illustrations emphasize saving the books, not the gore of war. This book is a good alternative perspective on the war, which nearly every child is aware of. Ages 5-10.

"Going for the Record," by Julie A. Swanson.

Seventeen-year-old Leah Weiczynkowski's soccer career and college prospects seem to be coming together, but her life begins to unravel when she finds out her father has cancer and has three months to live. What follows is a gripping, compassionate tale of a young girl's struggle to face her father's death and set priorities.

Swanson tells the tale of dying in a compassionate yet realistic manner; it is a love story that is not sappy but is marked by the mixed-up emotions of a teenage girl in a very tough situation. Ages 13-16.

"Clare and Francis," by Guido Visconte, illustrated by Bimba Landmann.

The story of St. Francis and St. Clare is retold in simple prose, but the stunning illustrations make this book a keeper. Visconte tells of Francis' and Clare's decisions to renounce wealth and help others. But if a picture is worth a thousand words, Landmann's colorful, full-page and minute illustrations adorned with gold make this book a million times more valuable. Ages 8 and up.

"Calavera Abecedario, A Day of the Dead Alphabet Book," by Jeanette Winter. Harcourt Inc.

"Calavera Abecedario" is a delightful, fun ABC book of skeletons! Inspired by Mexican artist Don Pedro Linares, who with his family made papier-mache objects, the book gives a brief description of how the "calaveras," or skeletons, come to life, then uses the "calaveras" to run through the ABCs, with different skeletons representing different people.

The translations for most of the Spanish words are clear from the bright, cheerful illustrations, but the author includes an alphabet glossary in the back with translations. All ages.

"Irish and Walter and the Substitute Teacher," by Elissa Haden Guest, illustrated by Christine Davenier.

Another easy-reader about Iris and Walter: Iris is happy and surprised when her grandpa is the substitute teacher, but by the second day she begins to struggle with sharing him with the other students. This four-chapter book has a happy ending, although Chapter 3 is titled "Misery." Davenier's humorous illustrations add to the fun. Ages 6-8.

ADVENT MESSAGE BRINGS HOPE TO HARDSHIP, DESPAIR

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A few years ago my husband, who at that time was working for a national conservation organization, guided a group of amateur naturalists on a spring junket to Big Bend National Park in southwest Texas. One of the trip's highlights by far was the profusion of wildflowers in the desert, both in numbers of blossoms and the variety of species.

Even more remarkable was the fact that some veteran members of the park's historical society saw flowers they had not observed in a quarter-century. It seems that the seeds of some wildflower species lie dormant for years until the right amount of moisture is available to them, and since the park had experienced higher than average rainfall the year before they were at last able to sprout, blooming forth in all their colorful glory.

This is the kind of imagery that the biblical writers use to convey hope to believers who patiently await the coming of the Lord, whether they are Isaiah's exiles returning to Jerusalem from Babylon; John's followers, who await the Messiah; or James' community, who await the risen Jesus' return in glory. In every case, the writers were addressing the inevitable weariness and discouragement that come with seemingly endless waiting.

Their response to the weary (to paraphrase) was the proclamation: "Look at the signs around you, and hang on just a little longer — your deliverance is closer than you think!"

Although the Son of God became flesh more than 2,000 years ago, the timeless message of Advent is for everyone who is experiencing discouragement and doubting that things ever will get better, or is going through the weariness of bearing hardship, or is in despair that prayer ever will be answered. Like the dormant seeds that await the life-giving rain in the desert, so the hope that lies buried in the hearts of all believers will bloom and bear fruit if we but wait patiently for the Lord's coming.

And the Lord is coming!

Questions:

In what ways have you become weary of waiting on the Lord? What hopes lie dormant in you right now, waiting for the Lord to bring them to life?

Sony BMG withdraws McFadden video after Catholic students taunted

BY CIAN MOLLOY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DUBLIN, Ireland — A promotional pop video for Brian McFadden, a former member of the popular Irish boy band Westlife, has caused students at a Dublin school to be taunted about allegations of child abuse.

Sony BMG recalled copies of the video sent to television stations worldwide after officials at St. Fintan's High School claimed they had been unfairly identified.

The video depicted McFadden as a taxi driver driving around north Dublin and reminiscing about his childhood.

Although St. Fintan's High School was not depicted in the video, at one stage McFadden was shown standing beside school railings bearing the plaque "St. Fintan's Boys' School" while he sang about being gay and being subjected to corporal punishment by Christian Brothers.

Although McFadden went to a Christian Brothers school, at no time was he a pupil at St. Fintan's. Critics also pointed out that McFadden, 24, was raised in an era when a culture of brutality was no longer common in Irish schools. Corporal punishment was made illegal in 1982.

In a statement, Sony BMG said they thought the name of the school shown in the video was fictitious.

"As soon as we were made aware of the issue, the promotional video was removed from TV stations, the shot was removed and a new version of the video was issued," said a Sony BMG statement.

However, the headmaster of St. Fintan's, Richard Fogarty, said he did not believe use of the school name was accidental.

"We are the only St. Fintan's School in the north side and the only Christian Brothers school in this area," he said. "Brian McFadden lives in Portmarnock, in the next parish, so he should be aware of that."

Fogarty said that in his 30 years as a teacher and principal at the school, he had "never known of any culture of brutality here."

He said although the school was ranked in the top 15 percent of Irish secondary schools for academic achievement, students were being taunted because of the video.

New Catholic radio program for U.S. young adults debuts

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — "Lino at Large," which hit the airwaves this fall, is the latest in a growing portfolio of radio programs sponsored by the Catholic Communication Campaign of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The fast-paced half-hour weekly program is described by its host and producer, Lino Rulli, as "Catholic radio for people our age," meaning those in their 20s and 30s.

"Lino at Large" can be heard Sunday evenings, 8:30-9:00 p.m. central time, on the Relevant Radio network, which owns and operates 14 stations and has an additional 13 affiliate stations across the East and Midwest.

Currently, only 92.7, WBPL-LP in Wilmington is the only affiliate in North Carolina to carry Relevant Radio. More information on the stations is available on the network's Web site, www.relevantradio.com.

The program is also being offered to all Catholic dioceses and to Catholic radio stations that are not part of the Relevant Radio network.

The "Lino at Large" radio program, which began airing Oct. 24, was inspired by "Generation Cross," an Emmy Award-winning Minneapolis-area cable TV show that Rulli created and hosted for six years.

"Generation Cross" was also seen on television stations in several Catholic dioceses through a grant from the bishops' communication campaign, known as CCC. Earlier this year, Rulli decided to cease production of the TV program to concentrate on radio.

"People always said I had a face for radio," said Rulli. "But seriously, I am very excited about the opportunity to reach new audiences with 'Lino at Large.'"

"'Generation Cross' took a very creative approach to reaching young people," said Pat Ryan Garcia, who as the CCC's director of distribution oversees radio for the USCCB.

"I thought that Lino's quirky combination of faith and humor would work equally well on radio," Garcia added in a statement.

The "Lino at Large" radio program is geared toward both young adult Catholics and non-Catholics who are interested in exploring what it means to be a Catholic in the world today.

Regular features of the program include:

— "What's on Father Peter's Mind?" Father Peter Laird, a teacher at St. Paul Seminary in St. Paul, Minn., who recently received a doctorate in sacred theology from the Alphonsian Academy in Rome, discusses current issues in the church.

— "Beat the Klock," with Father John Klockeman, spiritual director for the seminarians at St. John Vianney College Seminary in St. Paul, Minn. He answers listeners' questions about the Catholic faith in one minute or less.

— "Point/No Point," with comedian Bill Arnold and host Lino Rulli. They talk things over and offer advice. Arnold is co-writer and star of "Triple Espresso," a touring comedy troupe that has sold more than 1 million tickets.

The CCC also produces three other half-hour weekly radio programs: "Catholic Radio Weekly," a news and information program that debuted in 2001; "Catholic Bookmarks," which began production last summer and features author interviews and Catholic best-seller lists; and "American Catholic Radio," which also debuted this summer and is produced for the CCC by Franciscan Radio.

charity, ministry of the word, as well as ministry of the liturgy," said Deacon Ben Wenning, director of the diocesan office of the permanent diaconate.

The nature of a deacon's work includes assisting the pastor and pastoral associate of his assigned parish, primarily in the areas of prison ministry, RCIA, adult education, hospital visitation, baptism, marriage preparation and assisting at Mass.

Although a permanent deacon can preach at Mass, confer baptism and officiate at marriages and funerals, his ministry is not limited to liturgical functions, according to Deacon Wenning.

While the diaconate is a permanent office, it is a voluntary part-time position. Therefore, most deacons hold full-time jobs in order to support themselves and their families.

"Deacons volunteer about 10 hours each week in their parishes, based on their availability," said Deacon Louis Pais, permanent deacon at St. Mark Church in Huntersville and diocesan director of diaconate formation.

Like parish priests, deacons are assigned to a particular parish or ministry by the bishop of the diocese.

"Deacons are ordained for the service to the diocese," said Deacon Pais. "We go where the need is."

Currently there are 74 permanent deacons ministering in the Diocese of Charlotte, and 16 more men are in formation for ordination in June 2006.

The next class for the permanent diaconate begins in January 2006. Preparation consists of six months of spiritual development, completion of the two-year lay ministry program and four years of academic development.

The upcoming informational meetings at Our Lady of Grace and St. Matthew churches will help interested men discern the possible call to this ministry.

The permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte is open to men who are practicing Catholics, age 32 years and older residing within the diocese, with the recommendation of their pastors. In addition, a candidate must be a "conscientious believer in the faith," have completed the lay ministry program and have a "clear vision of Christ's Church in accord with the teachings of the Second Vatican Council."

Like any ministerial or lay vocation, the diaconate is a calling, said Deacon Pais. Candidates for the permanent diaconate should therefore prayerfully discern their calling.

"Ultimately, the permanent diaconate is a calling to service," said Deacon Pais.

WANT MORE INFO?

Information meetings on the permanent diaconate will be held Dec. 11 at 1:30 p.m. at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro and Dec. 18 at 1:30 p.m. at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

Applications will be accepted January through March 2005. Any man interested in applying for candidacy may write the Office of the Permanent Diaconate, 1123 S. Church St., Charlotte, NC 28203.

U.N. fails to ban cloning

tee of the U.N. General Assembly decided Nov. 19 that it would give up attempts to get a convention and try to deal with the subject in a compromise declaration.

The declaration would lack the legal force that a convention has for those countries that ratify it.

A resolution introduced by Belgium and supported by a number of other countries called for a convention that would rule out reproductive cloning to make a baby but let each country decide its own policy regarding therapeutic cloning, whereby scientists clone embryonic stem cells for therapies to repair or regenerate tissue to cure diseases.

Supporters of the resolution argued that a consensus already existed against reproductive cloning, and the United Nations could and should move quickly to put that consensus into international law.

But they were not willing to ban cloning for research purposes, which many people say holds the prospect of bringing cures for diseases such as Parkinson's, Alzheimer's and multiple sclerosis.

Although Secretary-General Kofi Annan was not directly involved in the legal committee's action, he said his personal view was to "go for therapeutic cloning."

Another resolution, introduced by Costa Rica and supported by the United States and others, asked for a convention outlawing all forms of human cloning, reproductive or therapeutic.

These countries contended that any form of human cloning was a violation of human dignity, and that the desired therapeutic results could be obtained through other means.

Disrespecting human dignity

From the time the proposal against reproductive cloning was first presented to the United Nations in 2001, the Vatican has insisted that all forms of human cloning be outlawed.

This position was presented at the world body that year by the nuncio at the time, then-Archbishop Renato R. Martino. Named a cardinal in October 2003, he is now head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

This year, in a paper issued Sept. 27, that Vatican reiterated its opposition to "the cloning of human embryos for the purpose of destroying them in order to harvest their stem cells."

As an alternative, it said the use of adult stem cells had already proved fruitful in research, and "does not entail any ethical problems."

Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's U.N. nuncio since October 2002, has made the cloning issue a principal focus of his efforts, and this fall used a newly won right for his mission to circulate the Vatican paper as a General Assembly document.

In a statement to the legal committee Oct. 21, he said the distinction drawn between therapeutic and reproductive cloning "seems specious" because both procedures use the same cloning process and both "involve disrespect for the dignity of the human being."

He also argued that the cloning issue was of such basic importance to the human community as a whole that it should be regulated by an international convention and not left to the decision of individual countries.

The nuncio declined to comment on the abandonment of efforts to get a convention on cloning. But in an interview with Catholic News Service at the end of last year's General Assembly session, he said the world body should produce a convention "to send a message," even if some countries refused to ratify it.

However, members of the legal committee decided through informal consultations that there was not enough consensus to proceed.

Disagreeing nations

Italy, a co-sponsor of Costa Rica's resolution against all human cloning, introduced draft language for a U.N. Declaration on Human Cloning Nov. 17, and two days later the committee agreed to make it the basis of further consideration of the issue.

Mohamed Bennouna, Morocco's ambassador to the United Nations and committee chairman, said it would have been "damaging for the committee to not come together on an issue with such grave consequences for humanity."

The Islamic countries, sometimes allied with the Vatican on life issues, have not played an identifiable role in the cloning debate, and reportedly have indicated their religious authorities have not yet made a definitive judgment on the question.

In nonbinding language, the declaration says that "member states are called upon to prohibit any attempts to create human life through cloning processes," and are called upon to adopt measures against any "genetic engineering techniques that may be contrary to human dignity."

A working group of the legal committee is to consider the draft declaration in February, and the committee would decide Feb. 18 whether to send the results of the working group's discussions to the General Assembly for final approval.

Weather forecasting and prayer

Sometimes they go hand in hand

Have you ever checked the weather before a big weekend?

You turn on the television and the forecaster tells you it's going to be chilly on Saturday and rainy on Sunday. No big problem — you plan to dress warmly one day and stay indoors on the other. Unfortunately, it turns out that Saturday is cold and wet and Sunday has nothing but sunshine.

Being fooled by the weather forecast is a shared experience in America that is as welcome as a traffic jam. Why does the media put so much emphasis on a forecast that is sometimes wrong? Why do we pay such close attention? Everyone knows that it's cold in winter and hot in summer. Shouldn't we just leave it at that?

Weather forecasters are like stockbrokers and gamblers — they try to predict the future. Following their advice can eventually annoy us, or in the case of the stockbroker or gambler, may cost us a great deal of money.

Scripture, it would seem, is on the side of not knowing what the future holds for us. In First Thessalonians, Paul tells us not to dwell on the future (5:1-2): "Now, brothers, about times and dates we do not need to write to you, for you know very well that the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night."

So why do we watch weather forecasts so closely? Why do we plan our activities around the predicted high temperature of the day when we know there is a chance that it is wrong?

Al Conklin is an experienced meteorologist at WBTV in Charlotte. Conklin's job is to forecast the future. He admits that he isn't always right with his forecasts, especially when he is looking more than three days into the future.

"I never take the credit when the sun shines down. That's God's work, not mine," he said.

Conklin is a committed Christian who "believes the Bible word for word as infallible."

Conklin talked recently about how he squares his Christian faith with the crystal ball aspect of his work. He explained that weather systems, even catastrophic ones like hurricanes, actually do some good.

"Hurricanes move warm air from the equator to the poles," he said. This movement keeps one part of the planet from being too cold and the other from being too hot.

That's great for Mother Earth. Of course, if you live in a mobile home park in a low lying area of Florida during storm season, it's awfully difficult to see the higher purpose of a Category 4 hurricane that threatens to destroy everything you own. That's where Conklin and the other forecasters come in.

"I take great satisfaction in knowing that I helped people prepare for a hurricane, a tornado or some other life threatening event," he said.

Conklin said he loves his work, but like the rest of us he doesn't always understand the weather. Part of his job takes him to elementary schools where students get to see a TV star in person who answers their questions.

"I recall a question from a youngster who simply asked me, 'Why does God allow bad weather like tornadoes?'" said Conklin. "My answer was that I didn't know. But I do know that after bad weather hits, it allows me a chance to serve God."

Conklin, through his church, helped the people of a small community in Illinois rebuild after a tornado.

Perhaps Conklin could rely on Proverbs 25:2 than the above verse from Thessalonians to justify his work at peering into the future: "It is the glory of God to conceal a matter; to search out a matter is the glory of kings."

We won't ever know for sure what tomorrow may bring. Weather forecasting simply reminds us that things are going to change, and for that we need to be prepared. Al Conklin, weather forecaster, will be the first to tell you that prayer is the best preparation of all.

Pope, at audience, says those in power must rule with justice

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Those who govern have a moral obligation to protect the poor and oppressed, Pope John Paul II said.

During his weekly general audience at the Vatican Dec. 1, the pope said that justice for all, especially the poor, is "fundamental for good government."

The Bible says that violating their rights is "an act against God, a religious crime," he said.

During his talk at the packed Pope Paul VI audience hall, the pope, inspired by Psalm 72, stressed the duty of those in power to commit themselves to moral integrity.

Good governments and rulers will exercise justice "above all with regard to the poor, who usually are the victims of the powerful," the pope said.

"Those who violate the rights of the poor don't only commit an act that is politically incorrect and morally unjust. For the Bible they also perpetrate an act against God, a religious crime, because the Lord is the defender of the miserable and the oppressed, of the widows and the orphans, that is those who don't have human protectors," he said.

In a departure from his prepared text, the pope said that the psalmist emphasized the "responsibility of those who have been entrusted with power."

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

They must be "honest and just, promote peace and take care of the weak and needy," he said. The ruler who succeeds in these tasks "will enjoy the respect of his people who will pray for him every day," the pope said.

He said the psalm illustrated the "annunciation of Christ, the Messiah" who came to establish "the new order."

In his printed text, the pope said the psalm locates the just and peaceful reign of the messiah with "a gaze that extends all over the map ... that involves Arabs and nomads, rulers of distant lands and even enemies in a universal embrace that is not rarely sung by the psalms."

He called the psalm "a lively and impassioned plea for the gift of justice."

The psalm said that the king "shall govern your people with justice and your afflicted ones with judgment. ... He shall defend the afflicted among the people, save the children of the poor and crush the oppressor."

Abortion and child abuse

Studies show links between abortion, neglect, depression

There is a significant statistical association between child abuse and abortion — a mutual relationship, whereby having an abortion makes the abuse of subsequent children more likely, and being abused as a child makes having an abortion later in life more likely.

Obviously, and first of all, abortion itself is the worst form of child abuse. Secondly, it should be noted that we are talking about statistical associations. These connections do not mean that everyone who has an abortion will abuse her children, or that everyone who is abused will have an abortion.

Having said that, let's examine why having an abortion may lead to more child abuse.

First of all, every pregnancy is a "crisis" in the best sense of the term. Pregnancy creates unique demands and challenges to the mother to mature; the body, the mind and the spirit must grow in order to accommodate to the child. This "crisis of incorporation," as psychologists call it, puts the mother at a crossroads: either she accepts the changes required of her by the pregnancy, or she aborts the child, hence choosing to regress rather than mature.

Guest Column

FATHER
FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

The choice not to mature, but rather to remain selfish, makes it more likely that the mother will remain a less mature parent, and this immaturity is a key cause of abuse and neglect of other children.

A second problem is that fathers have no legal right to save their unborn child from an abortion. Not knowing if the child will live or die creates ambivalence in the father and a reluctance to bond to the child. Unattached to their baby, they show less support to their partner as well.

After an abortion, the alienation worsens. Some studies show as high as an 80 percent rate of breakup of relationships after abortion. The mother's anger at the lack of support from the baby's father can be displaced to a born child.

A third reason why abortion can lead to child abuse is related to bonding. Having an abortion makes it more difficult to bond to a subsequent child, and babies who are not well bonded are more likely to be abused and neglected. A pregnancy following abortion creates more anxiety, caused in part by a fatalistic sense that the child will be abnormal (as a punishment for having aborted the previous one.) This anxiety can interfere with bonding.

Moreover, if the grief from the abortion is not adequately processed, it becomes a post-partum depression, which interferes with bonding. When one is still grieving a lost baby, one cannot attach to a new baby because the attachment is still to the one who died. Failure to attach to the one who is alive can lead to abuse and neglect.

There can also be a sense of disappointment in the subsequent child, who is compared to the aborted baby who is often idealized in the mother's mind. Expectations of the new child, sometimes viewed as a "replacement baby," are not fulfilled, resulting in anger that can lead to abuse and neglect.

The holiday spirit

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE
HEMRICK
GUEST COLUMNIST

For some, the Christmas holidays can be the best of times, while for others the worst of times. How do we make them a memorable time?

The holidays are a multidimensional experience. The better we understand this and choose what is basic to true happiness, the more we'll desire to repeat the holiday experience year after year.

Let's start with buying, giving and receiving gifts.

Several weeks prior to Thanksgiving the media begin a marketing blitz. No generation before us ever has had so many choices to make when selecting gifts.

We are encouraged to buy clothing, cosmetics and jewelry that give comfort and adorn. The worlds of technology and toys offer us gadgets that are both useful and entertaining. Exotic foods are lauded as the perfect gift for the palate.

Travel is another dimension of the holidays. Christmas is a time to visit loved ones or to be visited by them. Travel schedules are made far in advance, and a new excitement stirs within us as the time approaches to see someone we haven't seen for some time.

Yet another dimension of Christmas is found in the outreach by numerous institutions at this time of year to the poor, sick, troubled, elderly, prisoners and our armed forces abroad with gifts, food, clothing and heartfelt comfort.

Then there is the Advent season. As we move toward Christmas, so too does our liturgy with its stories of the awaited Messiah. Entering into the spirit of Advent is bound to help make the entire holiday season memorable.

Advent teaches us that the primary purpose of holiday gift-giving is not the giving of material things, but the giving of self. This is a good time to make a gift of ourselves to others.

The greatest gift of Christ was the gift of his heart to us. People often speak of their "significant other." Advent prepares us for Christ, who made everyone his significant other.

Our Christmas will assume new significance if when giving gifts, visiting loved ones or reaching out to troubled people we recognize them as others who are significant — people whose desires, fears, joys, hopes, faith and love truly matter to us.

The purpose of gift-giving at Christmas is to make us one in spirit with others. When two spirits come together in this manner, an unforgettable moment is created — one that has us wishing it never would pass and one that assures we'll happily look forward to the next holiday season.

What is it like to die?

Awakening to eternal life removes doubts

Five-year-old Meggie had been battling leukemia for more than half her young life. The disease went into remission for a while but returned stronger than ever, and no treatment could slow its growth.

By the time Meggie entered kindergarten, it was clear to everyone that she was going to lose the battle. Her parents tried to prepare themselves for Meggie's death, but how can one prepare for the unthinkable?

Meggie was such a spitfire. She had remained cheerful even when radiation sapped her strength and chemotherapy snatched away her dark brown curls. She was a favorite at the Children's Hospital, staging wheelchair races with the nurses and singing to fussy babies until they grinned at her with their bald heads and toothless smiles.

From the earliest days, Meggie had bubbled over with curiosity and enthusiasm, sometimes exasperating her parents by asking questions from morning until long after dark. Where do fireflies sleep? Why do we have toes? When Mary and Joseph went on a date, who baby-sat for baby Jesus? Who takes care of Big Bird when he gets sick? Can I have a cookie?

As Meggie grew sicker, her questions focused increasingly on death, and yet she did not speak in the frightened hush tones typically used by adults. Instead, she was as matter-of-fact about death as she was about frogs and ice cream cones.

What would happen to her body after she died? Would Santa Claus know how to find her? Would her parents replace her with another little girl? Could she bring her teddy bear with her to heaven? Does Jesus have a teddy bear?

Meggie's mother was able to answer most of the child's questions, but she dreaded the day when Meggie would ask about the actual process of dying. How could she explain something that she didn't understand herself?

Sure enough, the day finally arrived.

"Mama, what is it like to die?" Meggie asked with innocent curiosity. "Does it hurt? Will I be scared? Will you be with me?"

Meggie's innocence pierced her mother's heart, yet at that precise moment she knew exactly what to say.

"You know how sometimes you get scared in the middle of the night?" her mother began. "When that happens, you run across the hall to our room and climb into bed with Daddy and me, right?"

Meggie nodded her head, her dark eyes capturing every word.

"When you wake up the next morning, where are you Sweetheart?" her mother continued.

Meggie never had thought of that before. "I'm back in my own bed," she replied in surprise.

"That's right," her mother explained. "While you're asleep, your daddy picks you up in his big, strong arms and carries you back to your bed where you belong."

"That's what it's like to die. We're here on earth for only a little while, Sweetheart. Then, when the time is right, our heavenly Father picks us up in his big, strong arms and gently carries us home to heaven, which is where we really belong anyway."

"Oh," said Meggie with a contented sigh. "That's not scary at all."

A few weeks later, Meggie quietly slipped into a coma. The following night, her heavenly Father picked her up in his big, strong arms and gently carried her home to where she belonged.

Catholics find thriving parish in Shelby's St. Mary

SHELBY — The history of St. Mary Church found its beginnings thanks to clergy from Belmont Abbey and later, an enterprising Catholic from the North. In 1884, Benedictines from the abbey began visiting Shelby to celebrate Mass with the few Catholic families living here.

Attempts to establish a mission and to build a church in town during the years following went without success. Finally, in 1935, another effort was underway.

The Weldon family, who had relocated to Shelby from Pennsylvania that year, went to work locating Catholic families in the area. Anne Weldon approached Benedictine Father Cuthbert Allen of St. Michael Church in Gastonia about celebrating Mass in Shelby, and thus the spiritual foundation for a mission church was laid. Father Allen's first Mass in Shelby was celebrated in the home of Anne and Arthur Weldon Aug. 11, 1935.

St. Mary Church's existence as a mission of St. Michael Church continued into 1937, at which time the parishioners saw the result of their efforts come to fruition. A new 100-seat, cut-stone church was built from the designs of Benedictine Father Michael McNerney, a renowned architect who designed hundreds of buildings during his career.

On July 11, 1937, Benedictine Abbot Vincent Taylor of Belmont Abbey blessed the church. In October 1939, St. Mary Church attained parish status. Benedictines continued their pastorate at the church until 1944, when diocesan priests assumed responsibility for the parish, beginning with Father Walter Higgins.

St. Mary Church in Shelby was dedicated by Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh in 1966.

The parish purchased its first rectory in 1946 when then-pastor Father A. C. Adler raised $8,000. Parishioners matched the funds, and St. Mary Church had its first major expansion.

By the end of World War II, a number of Catholics had settled in Shelby, and in 1952 the parish was made up of 30 families. Industrial expansion from the north continued to bring Catholics to the region during the 1950s. To meet the needs of Catholics in the area, the parish paid particular attention to the enhancement of religious education and to evangelization.

In 1961, then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters established an Apostolic Training Center in nearby Kings Mountain to further the missionary movement at work in the Diocese of Raleigh, which encompassed all of North Carolina at the time. A church on the property was renovated and dedicated to Christ the King. With that development, Christ the King Church became a mission of St. Mary Church.

Back in Shelby, plans to expand the church facilities were underway during the early 1960s. In 1963, land was purchased on McGowan Road and the parish began construction of a multipurpose building that included a church, parish hall, classrooms and living quarters for the pastor. Bishop Waters dedicated the building in June 1966.

Parish life continued to thrive throughout the 1970s. By 1978, the parish debts had been paid, and a house was purchased for use as a rectory in 1980. By this time, St. Mary's parish had grown to 107 families.

After years of celebrating Mass, teaching and socializing in the multipurpose building, parishioners turned their attention to constructing a more suitable church. A building campaign began in 1985, and then-Bishop John F. Donoghue dedicated the new 450-seat St. Mary Church in May 1992.

Father Carl Kaltreider served as pastor of St. Mary Church from June 1996 until October 1999, taking the reins from Msgr. William Wellein, who had spent 12 years at the church. On Oct. 15, 1999, Father Eric Houseknecht, vicar forane for the Gastonia Vicariate, assumed the pastorate of the energetic parish, comprised of more than 240 families active in the Ladies' Guild, Men's Club, youth ministry and other parish and civic outreach activities.

Victims of human trafficking tell their stories at conference

BY

ANA RODRIGUEZ-SOTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MIAMI — At a recent conference on human trafficking, victims told tales of forced labor and torture, of beatings and threats, of people who preyed on their dreams and trampled their psyches.

One spoke from behind a screen, still fearful that her former master would find her. Another revealed her face but not her current hiding place; her slave master — a woman — had threatened her children back in Mexico.

A third individual, reed thin and elegant in a pinstriped suit, stood tall — 6 feet 5 inches tall to be exact. Fearful no more, he challenged the world to free his people.

CONCORD — Describing it as a long-awaited moment for a "thriving and growing parish," Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated the new St. James Church in Concord.

The bishop concelebrated the dedication Mass with Redemptorist Father James Geiger, pastor, and a number of diocesan and Redemptorist priests Dec. 5.

"Jesus brings salvation to this house of prayer by his presence," said Bishop Jugis. "May Christ fill up our hearts, and fill out this place, with his divine presence."

MENDING SOULS

Catholic chaplain at military hospital finds work hard but rewarding

LANDSTUHL, Germany (CNS) — There was no doubt that Specialist Ronald Baker of the Arkansas Army National Guard was going to die.

All that kept the Arkansas man alive at the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center was a life-support system and his wife's concern for his soul.

The 34-year-old soldier had never been baptized, and his wife needed the reassurance that the soldier would leave the world as a Christian after he had been severely wounded by an improvised explosive device in Iraq Oct. 7.

The woman, a Protestant, asked a Catholic priest, Father Richard Sirianni, to baptize her husband. A military chaplain who is a lieutenant colonel in the Oregon Air National Guard, Father Sirianni had been helping the comatose man's loved ones since they had arrived in Germany.

Father Sirianni, who is pastor of St. Henry Church in Gresham, Ore., baptized Ron Baker shortly before he died.

The priest's days on duty can be long, but Father Sirianni is glad to be ministering overseas. He is the only full-time priest-chaplain at this massive hospital. His active duty began Sept. 25 and will continue through Dec. 21.

"It can be exhausting. On the other hand, it's very rewarding," said Father Sirianni, a priest for 26 years and an Air National Guard chaplain for 17 years.

Landstuhl, the largest U.S. military hospital outside the United States, receives all the wounded soldiers from Iraq and Afghanistan. Its team of eight chaplains and five assistants look after patients' emotional and spiritual well-being as intently as the doctors and nurses work on their wounds.

Father Sirianni ministers to the injured and also helps visiting family members with accommodations and pastoral support. He walks them through the many details of care — and death.

"You make sure that no aspect of caring for people is overlooked," he said. During his day, he makes his rounds to visit the Catholic soldiers. A significant number of soldiers are Latino and Catholic, and there is a serious shortage of priests in the military who can minister to Catholic personnel. But Father Sirianni visits anyone in need, whether they are Catholic or not.

The priest noted that when he returns to the United States he will have a new respect for the country's young people.

"I will never chase a skateboarder away from my church again," he said.

Center presents 'Nostra Aetate' Award to Knights of Columbus

NEW YORK (CNS) — The Knights of Columbus fraternal organization was honored Dec. 1 with one of the annual "Nostra Aetate" Awards given by the Center for Christian-Jewish Understanding at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn.

Presenting the award at a dinner in New York, Anthony J. Cernera, university president, praised the Knights for "outstanding leadership and commitment to promoting dialogue and understanding" and for "courageously striving to make the world a better place for the next generations."

The awards take their name from the Second Vatican Council document "Nostra Aetate," which called for an end to anti-Semitism.

Carl Anderson, supreme knight, accepted the award on behalf of his organization, and said the Knights had felt challenged to find new ways of furthering understanding, "especially since the events of Sept. 11," a reference to the terrorist attacks on the United States in 2001.

The awards were presented at a $ fund-raising dinner attended by 200 people at Park Avenue Synagogue in Manhattan.

As part of his organization's more recent programs, Anderson recalled that it provided support for the "Concert of Reconciliation" held at the Vatican in January to express the common heritage of the three Abrahamic faiths — Christianity, Judaism and Islam.

The concert was held under the patronage of the pontifical councils for Christian unity and for interreligious dialogue, and funding was provided by the Knights of Columbus.

He concluded with a call for a dialogue that went beyond seeking an end to hostility between Jews and Christians to working for "a friendship that is enriched by the treasures of both of our rich traditions."

Qatar conference calls for societal strengthening of parenthood

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The head of the Pontifical Council for the Family said parenthood has been devalued in contemporary life and that it is in any state's best interests to enhance the parent's role in society.

Cardinal Alfonso Lopez Trujillo spoke at an international meeting on family issues in Doha, Qatar, Nov. 29-30. Representatives from many countries, religions and organizations attended the conference to discuss how to protect the traditional family structure that many see as under attack from secular forces.

"The family, a natural society, exists prior to the state, any other political organization or jurisdictional institution," the cardinal said. "Therefore, the originality and identity of the family based on marriage must be recognized by the political authorities."

"We are disturbed by the dramatic devaluation of motherhood in our societies," he said. "Motherhood is not simply a job comparable to many other worthy professions; it is much more."

The father's role, Cardinal Lopez said, "which all too often is obscured, is of great importance in the formation of the children's personality ... the father's presence in the home is an essential element of the children's upbringing."

Cardinal Lopez said "an ideology hostile to the family is spreading in some parliaments," referring to recent legislative proposals in Europe and North America allowing gay marriage or granting legal status to gay couples.

The cardinal also criticized an "exacerbated feminism that considers marriage and the family a place of slavery, and fatherhood and motherhood an unbearable burden that turns to fear."

Pope praises continued efforts to eliminate land mines

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II praised countries committed to the eradication of land mines, weapons he called "the terrible scourge of modern times."

In a statement read Dec. 2 to participants at an international conference on anti-personnel mines in Nairobi, Kenya, the pope called for continued efforts to remove mines from affected countries and destroy stockpiles of the weapons.

Special attention should be given to the innocent victims of land-mine explosions, he told the conference, the first convened to review compliance with the 1999 Ottawa Mine Ban Treaty, which bans the use, production, stockpiling and transfer of anti-personnel mines.

The pope's statement was read by Bishop Giampaolo Crepaldi, secretary of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace and the Vatican representative at the Nov. 29 - Dec. 3 conference.

Five years after going into effect, the pact has become a fundamental measure that reinforces international humanitarian rights and demonstrates "a tangible example of solidarity between nations and between peoples," the pope said in his address.

Not only do land mines cause "slaughter and mutilation of numerous innocent victims," but their continued presence "weighs heavily on developing countries, depriving them of the agricultural land essential for their survival," the pope said.

Greater cooperation between countries affected by the weapons and those that are not and between rich and poor countries is needed, he said. Wealthy countries should make political choices and financial commitments to address the problem, showing "sincere and concrete commitment of the signatory countries."

Those countries should unite "to oppose a culture of death and to build with trust a culture of life," the pope said.

According to the sixth annual report by the International Committee to Ban Landmines released Nov. 18, while casualties due to land-mine accidents have dropped since 1999 there are still some 15,000 to 20,000 deaths every year; 86 percent of those victims are civilians and 23 percent are children. The report said there are 200 million mines stockpiled across the globe.

A SAINT YOU SHOULD KNOW

John of the Cross' (1541-1591) life was a heroic effort to live up to his name "John as reformer, mystic-poet and theologian-priest. Ordained a Carmelite, John engaged in the work of reform, and experienced increasing opposition, persecution and imprisonment. While imprisoned, John began writing poetry. John is unique as mystic-poet, expressing in his prison-cross the ecstasy of mystical union with God.

DID YOU KNOW ?

The word Advent derives from the Latin word meaning "coming." During Advent we recall the history of God's people and reflect on how the prophecies and promises of the Old Testament were fulfilled. This provides a background for the present. Today we can reflect on the past "track record" of God and so begin to understand what it means to us now for the sake of what is to come, in our own future and that of our world.

Devereux, members of the Legionaries of Christ, ministering in Atlanta.

CCWG has been associated with Legionaries of Christ priests since the group's inception in 2000. The priests visit monthly to provide catechesis and spiritual direction to the members of CCWG.

Immediately following the Mass, Mary Summa, president of the CCWG, presented Bishop Jugis with a "spiritual bouquet" of more than 80 hours of eucharistic adoration. Many members of the CCWG had spent time in adoration during the month of October for Bishop Jugis and his intentions.

In her presentation speech, Summa praised the bishop for his courage and dedication to the Eucharist through the pastoral letter, "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion," which he signed in August with Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston.

"When you pray in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament, you are overwhelmed with the love Christ has for you," said Renee O'Brien, CCWG board member. "You know that, just as the father welcomed the prodigal son, Christ is waiting for you to spend time with him."

During his homily, Bishop Jugis described Advent as a time of waiting, when "God stirs up our hearts and our hope for the second coming of Christ."

"Every holy Communion is a looking forward to the glory of the Lord's coming on the last day ... that is Advent," he said.

The day of the resurrection is a day for the faithful servants of Christ to wait in joyful hope, not in fear, of the coming revelation, Bishop Jugis explained.

Following the Mass, Father Devereux continued the theme of Advent as a time of waiting and reflection in a short talk he presented to members of CCWG.

"You are entering into some of the most precious days of the year," Father Devereux said. "Don't let our artificial, secular world take this away from you ... start asking Jesus for fire — warmth and light — but don't let it burn out of control."

Father Devereux told the women, most of whom are wives and mothers, that although their husbands are the spiritual heads of the households, the women are the "keepers of the hearth," providing their children with the warmth of the Christian faith.

Father Devereux also urged the women to consider what their greatest gift is, suggesting they might consider it to be their husband, children or health.

Church to host community Christmas dinner

Free event open to public, shut-ins

ALBEMARLE — A delicious, traditional Christmas dinner is in the works to bring fellowship and joy to the community.

Our Lady of the Annunciation Church is hosting the 15th Annual Community Christmas Dinner 11 a.m.-2 p.m. Dec. 25. The free event is also sponsored by Central Methodist, Christ Episcopal, First Baptist, First Lutheran, First Presbyterian, Resurrection and Union Chapel AME Zion churches.

"Since 1990, local churches and volunteers throughout Stanly County have partnered together to provide one of the most unifying and rewarding events in our area, the Annual Community Christmas Dinner," said Olga Throneburg, chair of the volunteer steering committee that plans the event.

"Dozens of other people give part of their Christmas Day to help cook, serve, clean up and deliver meals to homebound persons," she said.

The event originated with a local couple, Claudia and Jeff Covington, who realized most restaurants are closed on Christmas Day. Because many single individuals and travelers had no place to share a holiday meal, the Covingtons decided to serve a Christmas dinner to anyone, who for any reason, found themselves alone on Christmas Day.

"Jesus Christ is the greatest gift," he told them "All of your gifts — husbands, children, your health — are reflections of the gift of Jesus."

Father Devereux also said Christ wants us to live with "unadulterated joy."

"Joy is discovering God within us and allowing him to take over — that's where God's will is born," he said.

God brings a lot of joy out of sacrifices, Father Devereux said.

"The most painful moments are also the most joyful," he said. "Then we are

Since then, a church has hosted the event for two consecutive years, and then passed the responsibility to another participating church. A volunteer team works to serve what now numbers 900 Christmas Day meals at no charge, thanks to donations from individuals and businesses.

Other highlights include Christmas stockings for children and Christian entertainment.

"Everyone is welcome. Last year was a great success and we hope to build on that success with the continued support of individuals and businesses in the local community," said Throneburg. "I sincerely thank everyone for their contributions."

Catholic Heritage Society members honored at annual event

by KEVIN E. MURRAY
editor

CHARLOTTE — Members of the Catholic Heritage Society were honored at a Mass celebrated at St. Matthew Church on Nov. 7.

Nearly 80 members of the society attended the Mass celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis. A dinner followed.

The Catholic Heritage Society was formed in 1994 to recognize those people who have indicated that they intend to leave gifts in their wills and estate plans to a parish, school, the diocese, the foundation or other Catholic organization in the diocese.

There are currently more than 500 members of the society, but many more Catholics have remembered the entities of the Diocese of Charlotte in their estate plans without disclosing that information.

In fact, according to Gina Rhodes, diocesan director of planned giving, an estimated 6 percent of Catholics in the diocese have remembered the Catholic Church in their estate plans.

Some of those individuals have chosen to leave their gifts to the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. Currently, the foundation has more than $10.3 million in assets. Most of the 115 endowments in the foundation are designated for parishes.

Contributions may be designated or undesignated gifts for a specific parish, school, foundation or organization, or to the Diocese of Charlotte in general.

"Through their gifts, members of the Catholic Heritage Society are leaving a legacy that will help meet the needs of individuals in the Diocese of Charlotte for generations to come," said Jim Kelley, executive director of the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. "More and more parishioners across the diocese are following their example by remembering the church in their current and future estate plans."

endowments take another step in living out the life of stewardship.

"Just as we make gifts from our monthly income, we also have an opportunity to give from our accumulated assets to endow the church of the Diocese of Charlotte," he said.

"We encourage all Catholics to consider becoming members of the Catholic Heritage Society," Rhodes said.

Former janitor at Catholic university leaves school $2.3 million

GREAT FALLS, Mont. (CNS) — An Italian immigrant who spent his retirement working as a janitor at the University of Great Falls left the Catholic school a bequest of $2.3 million when he died.

Genesio Morlacci died Oct. 31 at the age of 102, leaving behind only extended family. But his will gave the small private university in the Diocese of Great Falls-Billings the largest single gift it had ever received.

Eugene McAllister, president of the university, announced the "extraordinary gift from an extraordinary gentleman" Nov. 15.

McAllister explained that Morlacci, who was raised in Tracy, Mont., made his fortune as the owner of a dry-cleaning business in Great Falls. He lived frugally, and even after retiring from the dry cleaners Morlacci took a part-time job at the university.

"He was an excellent businessman who was willing to work 18-20 hours a day," McAllister said. Morlacci's will specified that 95 percent of his bequest be used for scholarships.

"The students who will be receiving scholarships from the Morlacci endowment will be benefiting from each of those long hours Mr. Morlacci put in the 18- to 20-hour days," McAllister said.

"Although he had roughly the equivalent of a third-grade education, he placed enormous value on education," he continued. "Mr. Morlacci's life and gift are an inspiration to us. His life is also a lesson to us in the value of work, sacrifice and belief in a greater purpose."

The University of Great Falls is a liberal arts school established in 1932 as a junior college for women. It currently has about 800 students, 80 percent of whom receive financial aid.

Belmont Abbey College students bring Christmas to local families

Project 'Christmas at the Abbey' to make a difference

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College recently brought some Christmas cheer to those in need.

Students, faculty, staff and members of the monastery have begun "Christmas at the Abbey," a new annual program in which they "adopt" children and their families in the Gaston County area.

Inspired by Benedictine Father Chris Kirchgessner and several students and faculty members, Christmas at the Abbey began with a campus-wide tree-trimming party Dec. 4, followed by a private Christmas party for the children and their parents.

"Initially, we thought it would be great if we could bring Christmas to just one child in the area and make it special for him," said Father Kirchgessner. "But as we discussed the idea, the students felt that that wouldn't be enough. They are excited about bringing Christmas to as many families as possible."

With help from teachers in local elementary schools, the college identified several children and their families to have a very merry Christmas this year. As many as 38 campus groups and organizations at Belmont Abbey College, including fraternities and sororities, athletic teams, clubs and first year symposium classes, purchased toys, clothing and other items.

"This project, Christmas at the Abbey, is what the Benedictine tradition and Belmont Abbey College are all about," said Father Kirchgessner. "We feel it's a great way to share our heritage and give something back to the community."

"There is also something incredible about watching a child open up a gift you've wrapped and placed under the tree — to see the joy in their faces, especially during this time of year, is a wonderful thing," he said.

Seven Scouts earn Eagle ranks

CHARLOTTE — Seven Boy Scouts in Troop 8 from St. Matthew Church have earned their Eagle ranks.

The Scouts were honored in a ceremony with more than 150 guests attending at St. Matthew Church Oct. 23.

David Baranowski, Chris Bodman, Stephen Lingen, Samson Mesele, Matthew Mounie, Ian O'Shaughnessy and Brenton Vasconcellos each earned a minimum of 21 badges and did a service project to earn the rank, which is the highest rank in Boy Scouts.

Baranowski made improvements at the outdoor courtyard at Sunrise Assisted Living on Rea Road in Charlotte.

Bodman built fitness equipment for McMullen Greenway Park.

Lingen built a deck and benches for a park in a Habitat for Humanity neighborhood in Matthews.

Mesele led a group that built a garden at St. Matthew School.

Mounie built a gazebo at St. Bernadette Church in Linville.

O'Shaughnessy performed trail and campsite maintenance at Uwharrie National Forest.

Vasconcellos collected, wrapped and distributed gifts for disadvantaged children at the annual Christmas Day party at Good Ol' Days restaurant.

Five BAC students selected for Who's Who directory

College nominates best leaders for national honor

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College has selected five outstanding students as exceptional campus leaders to be included in the 2004 edition of "Who's Who Among American Colleges and Universities."

Selected for this year's edition were Sean O'Connor, Janna Ruffner, Benjamin Safranski, Emily Toy and Stefanie Whorton.

The criteria in selecting nominees include: students of junior or senior class status, evidence of scholarship ability (minimum 3.25 cumulative GPA), participation and leadership in extracurricular activities, service to the community and potential for future achievement.

Campus committees and editors of the national directory nominated the students. The students join an elite group from more than 2,300 institutions of higher learning in all 50 states and several universities overseas.

Outstanding students have been honored in the annual directory since it was first published in 1934.

Belmont Abbey College students represent more than 18 countries and 34 states and pursue undergraduate degrees in a number of liberal arts course offerings. Founded in 1876, the college is inspired by the Benedictine monastic tradition.

'This is the beginning of a great time for St. James Church.'

Many gather for church dedication bus St. James Council approached the locked church before the Mass. There, Father Geiger presented Bishop Jugis with the architectural blueprints, photo journal and keys to the church.

Bishop Jugis returned the keys to Father Geiger, who unlocked the church doors and allowed the congregation inside for the dedication Mass, during which the bishop anointed with chrism and incensed the altar and walls of the church.

"Our new church is absolutely beautiful, and I am so excited about this day," said Margaret Frye, whose mother has been a parishioner of the church for 73 years.

"A lot of work went into it," she said.

The new 800-seat church on Manor Avenue replaces the former church on Union Street, which accommodated only 200 people. The current 800-family congregation has gathered for Mass in the parish center since 1998.

In a recent letter to parishioners, Father Geiger thanked them for their generous support in the construction of the church.

"I know there is a certain sadness in leaving our Union Street church where, for almost 50 years, Catholic life in all its aspects flourished because of so many dedicated clergy and parishioners, living and deceased," said Father Geiger.

"Let us pray ... that the tradition of living our life in Christ, as was done at St. James (Church) on Gold Hill Road, on Union Street and now here, will continue to make us a community of faith, hope and love," he said.

The first St. James Church was built and dedicated Aug. 1, 1869, and designated a parish in 1947. A fire destroyed that church in 1954, and Mass was celebrated in a variety of locations — including a community center and a Protestant church — until a new church was dedicated in 1955.

In a double ceremony July 31, 1994, then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated the former parish center and helped commemorate the church's 125th anniversary.

As the parish continued to grow, its members began looking in 2000 for property to build a new church. A groundbreaking ceremony was held in November 2003. In addition to a larger church, a new parish center and an office building with classrooms were also constructed on the property.

"It's been many years in the making, but it turned out far beyond my expectations," said Dennis Durand, a parishioner and member of the Knights of Columbus St. James Council.

"It will be very beneficial to the parish and the community," he said.

"This is the beginning of a great time for St. James Church," said Father Geiger.

Holy Trinity student honored for food collection

CHARLOTTE — Erika Pascarella, 14, an eighth-grader at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School, has been recognized by the N.C. Commission of Volunteerism and Community Service for organizing a neighborhood food collection last Christmas.

Erika was awarded for collecting more than 200 canned food items for needy families in Cabarrus County. She received the award at Glenwood Baptist Church in Marion Nov. 8.

Last Christmas season, Erika was inspired by a local newspaper article about Jim Murphy of Concord who, with the help of volunteers and donations, has fed needy and shut-in people on Christmas Day for more than 30 years.

Erika created and distributed flyers around her neighborhood asking for donations of canned food. She collected and delivered the donations to Murphy, allowing him to serve more than 9,000 meals Christmas Day.

Murphy was so impressed with her efforts that he nominated Erika for the North Carolina Award for Outstanding Volunteer Service.

The statewide volunteer recognition program, established in 1979, is an important part of the history and tradition of volunteerism and community service in North Carolina. Since the program's inception, more than 15,000 North Carolinians have received the award.

"Volunteers are the driving force behind programs and organizations that assist thousands of North Carolinians every day," said Gov. Michael Easley, who announced the awards in early November.

"They lend a helping hand to our children, adults, seniors and at-risk and underserved populations, and give back so much to our communities," he said. "This award honors and thanks our volunteers for their invaluable service to our state."

Nearly 50 Charlotte Catholic students named AP Scholars

SEVERAL LEVELS OF EXCELLENCE RECOGNIZED
BY COLLEGE BOARD

CHARLOTTE — Forty-nine students at Charlotte Catholic High School have become AP scholars.

The College Board's Advanced Placement Program offers students the opportunity to take challenging college-level courses while still in high school, and to receive college credit and advanced placement for successful performances on the AP exams.

Students took the exams in May after completing challenging college-level courses at their high schools. The College Board recognizes several levels of achievement based on a student's performance on AP exams.

Approximately 17 percent of the more than 1 million high school students in almost 15,000 schools worldwide who took the AP exams performed at a sufficiently high level to merit the recognition of AP Scholar.

At Charlotte Catholic, students Michael Florack and Alex Queen qualified for the National AP Scholar Award by earning a grade of four or higher on a five-point scale on all AP exams taken, and grades of four or higher on eight or more of these exams.

Ten Charlotte Catholic students qualified for the AP Scholar with Disinction Award by earning an average grade of at least 3.5 on all AP exams taken, and grades of three or higher on five or more of these exams.

These students were Joseph Cashman, Michael Florack, Patrick Herford, Sarah Knish, Patrick Kopfle, Ashley Mason, Marie Pierman, Alex Queen, Lara Stocker and Daniel Yarbrough.

Another 10 Charlotte Catholic students qualified for the AP Scholar with Honor Award by earning an average grade of at least 3.25 on all AP exams taken, and grades of three or higher on four or more of these exams.

These students were Brian Becker, Richard Bernard, Keith Fitschen, Troy Francis, James Gaiser, Amanda Griffin, Robert Gurdian, Laura Hanson, Brian Kossler and Daniel Ternes.

Twenty-nine students qualified for the AP Scholar Award by completing three or more AP examinations, with grades of three or higher.

Books suitable for Christmas gift-giving — part II

REVIEWED BY BARB FRAZE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The following children's books are suitable for Christmas giving.

"The Black Regiment of the American Revolution," by Linda Crotta Brennan, illustrated by Cheryl Kirl Noll.

Moon Mountain took a decent story — the tale of the 1st Rhode Island Regiment — added colorful illustrations, maps, reproductions of original documents and interesting fact boxes to make a book that will fascinate young readers interested in history.

Brennan tells the story of the Black Regiment's battles throughout the American Revolution and — at the end — the impact the regiment had on slavery in several American states, primarily in New England.

Noll's illustrations bring the tale to life, giving a human face to harsh conditions and battles. The Rhode Island Historical Society allowed reproduction of some original documents as illustrations, and maps and timelines add to the book's appeal.

The back of the book includes a glossary, places to visit and Web sites and books for readers to learn more.

This book is suitable for reading aloud or for older elementary students reading on their own. Ages 7-12.

"Mississippi Morning," by Ruth Vander Zee, illustrated by Floyd Cooper.

In this story from Mississippi in the 1930s, a young boy loses his innocent view of life, friendship and family when he discovers the existence of the Ku Klux Klan — and that his father, whom he was always proud of, is a member. Cooper's large, earth-tone illustrations speak of a struggling time and add depth to the book.

Vander Zee tells the powerful tale from a young boy's view in a loving way, but because of the subject matter adults might want to read through this book with children. Ages 9-12.

"Why Epossumondas Has no Hair on His Tail," by Coleen Salley, illustrated by Janet Stevens.

Epossumondas wonders why his tail is not thick, furry, fluffy or bushy like the tails of his friends, so Mama tells him about how his great-great grandpa got himself in trouble with Bear and lost all the fluff. Salley's book is full of action verbs and colorful adjectives that make this especially good as a read-aloud tale.

Stevens' illustrations of the persimmon-loving Papapossam, instigating Hare and aggravated Bear help make this book a winner. Ages 5 and up.

"Miss Malarkey's Field Trip," by Judy Finchler and Kevin O'Malley, illustrated by Kevin O'Malley.

Miss Malarkey's class goes on a field trip to the science museum, and thus begins a series of adventures and misadventures. This clever story tells a student's view of how the trip went for the teacher and has something everyone can relate to, including a chaperoning parent who will not get off the cell phone.

O'Malley's watercolor and pencil illustrations, complete with conversation bubbles, add humor to a story that works well for reading aloud or as a fairly easy read. Ages 5-8.

"Everywhere Babies," by Susan Meyers, illustrated by Marla Frazee.

This highly acclaimed picture book, originally published in 2001, has been republished in a small cardboard book format that is toddler-friendly.

Toddlers will delight in Meyers' rhyming descriptions, and Frazee's humorous, multicultural illustrations make this a winner for those reading as well as those being read to.

Many pages have three or four illustrations — although some bright, colorful illustrations span two pages — and the story lends itself to toddlers' attention to detail and fascination with babies. Toddlers will always be picking up this book — and no one has to worry about ripped pages. Ages 6 months-3 years.

'Doctor Zhivago' to air on PBS

NEW YORK (CNS) — Boris Pasternak's revered tale of revolution and romance gets a dusting off for a two-part public television production of "Doctor Zhivago," being rebroadcast Sunday, Dec. 19, 9-11 p.m. EST and concluding Sunday, Dec. 26, at the same time on PBS (check local listings).

During the opening two hours it is difficult not to compare this version unfavorably to David Lean's classic 1965 movie starring Omar Sharif and Julie Christie as the star-crossed lovers caught in the turmoil of the Russian Revolution.

While the production values are exceptional, numerous bedroom scenes and brief nudity, not to mention the shootings and suicides, make this better suited to adult viewers.

Pare is a former director of the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Advent a time to regain contact with people to venerate

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

One sweltering afternoon in September, I trudged across the mall parking lot, eager to be embraced in the chill of cold air that waited within. Finally out of the heat, I heard Bing Crosby crooning Christmas carols.

"How can this be?" I asked myself.

Nevertheless, Bob Hope's right-hand man's voice was back in the sound system, inviting us to journey once again down a snowy memory lane.

By the time Halloween has arrived, Christmas preparation has spread from the malls to the neighborhoods. Children who go out to trick or treat are confronted with twinkling Christmas lights in some neighborhoods. Moreover, by sundown Thanksgiving Day the "Christmas season" has moved into overdrive.

On this fourth and last Sunday of Advent, our spiritual preparation for celebrating the birth of Jesus some 2,000 years ago and our anticipation of his coming again in glory can be overwhelmed by the world around us. In the midst of trying to beat the crowd, we may lose contact with the actual people whose lives we venerate.

Perhaps one of the persons we tend to overlook is Joseph, betrothed to Mary of Nazareth. In works of art and literature, Joseph seems to stand in the quiet shadows like a giant oak offering protection and strength without our seeing its complexity and true goodness.

Matthew's Gospel reveals to us a man who must have felt as if his world were crashing around him when he received the news that the woman he loved was pregnant with someone else's child. In Joseph's world, his options ranged from having Mary publicly stoned to quietly divorcing her. Joseph's choice revealed to us a man of character, caught between the demands of the law and his concern for Mary's reputation. Matthew tells us that Joseph was "unwilling to expose (Mary) to shame."

However, God reveals another option beyond Joseph's wildest imagining in a dream. Joseph, a man who listened to his dreams, recognized the voice of God. Later when he welcomed Mary into his home, Joseph was saying "yes" to God and "yes" to the child in Mary's womb.

This remarkable man would love and guide the child who would grow up to save his people from their sins — the child who would be the ultimate sign that God is, indeed, with us.

Cinematic spirit

Vatican film festival fosters debate about spirituality

BY SARAH DELANEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Representatives from the Vatican, the film world and academia met Dec. 1-2 to debate cinematic visions of people, their creations and their spirituality.

The Vatican's eighth International Festival of Spiritual Cinema was to explore people's relationship with the technology they have created. The theme was "Man-Machine Hybridization, Identity and Conscience in Post-Modern Cinema."

Fifteen films — from "I, Robot" to "Men in Black" to "2001: A Space Odyssey" — will be shown at a Rome movie theater Dec. 14-19.

In opening remarks of the debate Dec. 1, Archbishop John P. Foley, president of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, said that cinema "has effectively represented the anxieties and fears tied to a future in which man must face the consequences of a hybridization with the machine that has been pushed to the extreme and that he himself has put into motion."

But what do "Alien" and "The Matrix" have to do with spiritual cinema?

Archbishop Foley said that "eternal doubts about artificial intelligence and sentiments, technology and respect for universal values" are represented in many films that force people to ask themselves difficult ethical questions.

In a news conference Nov. 29 to introduce the festival, Cardinal Paul Poupard, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture, said the films and their futuristic subjects raised troubling questions that the church seeks to address in cultural contexts like the festival.

"The machine appears to be the robotic annulment of the spiritual dimension," Cardinal Poupard said. "In reality, today's man cannot separate himself from the fruit of his intelligence and creativity, from his art and technique, from his engineering and literature, from his reason and artifice," he said.

"Can these machines develop autonomously, evolve and replicate man? Or will they remain a multitude of different types of robotic intelligence, but without the freedom and responsibility of man?" he asked. "Are these queries for a distant future, sources for science fiction and laboratory research, or are they already present in the imagery of our memories?"

Cardinal Poupard said the church "seeks traces of the voice of the Spirit in contemporary cinematic productions, even when they seem distant from our horizons."

Archbishop Foley said at the news conference that the increasing use of technology offers "undeniable advantages, but with some dangerous effects."

He asked, "Are we trying to humanize machines or to transform man into something inhuman?"

The debate and festival address the danger that increasing technology poses to people's dignity and relationship with God, he said.

"We absolutely cannot neglect the principle of respect for the human person and his need for spirituality," Archbishop Foley said.

It is up to people to decide what to do with the machines they have made, he said.

The festival offers "a moment to reflect and look into the future," he added.

Some of the other films to be shown are "Forbidden Planet" by Fred M. Wilcox, Stephen Spielberg's "Minority Report" and Frank Oz's "The Perfect Woman."

Jessica Biel stars as "Abigail" in "Blade: Trinity," a violent fantasy action sequel about a brooding half-mortal, half-vampire slayer (Wesley Snipes), who must join forces with a team of vampire-hunters and battle an army of bloodsuckers bent on resurrecting Dracula to spawn a vampiric master race. This bloodfest dishes out the same tedious gore and cheesy dialogue as the first two installments. Excessive violence, much profanity and rough language. Catholics shouldn't get 'Closer' to this film

BY HARRY FORBES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Director Mike Nichols — no stranger to charting corrosive relationships on screen — returns to that unpleasant territory in "Closer," a faithful, if streamlined, adaptation of Patrick Marber's West End and Broadway stage award-winner.

Focusing on the romantic interrelationships of four amoral people in contemporary London — Anna, a photographer (Julia Roberts); Dan, a newspaper obituary writer (Jude Law); Alice, a former stripper, now waitress and free spirit (Natalie Portman); and Larry, a dermatologist (Clive Owen) — the film deals with their sexual attraction in almost purely verbal terms, but the sexually charged dialogue is quite graphic, and, as on stage, shocking in its bluntness, and will be an immediate turn-off to Catholic moviegoers.

The film begins with Dan and Alice forming an immediate physical attraction as they approach each other at a London intersection. In her distraction, Alice is hit by a car, and Dan takes her to the hospital.

Time passes. Dan and Alice are now a couple. Dan is having his portrait done by Anna in her photo studio. There's an instant chemistry between the two, though Anna is distressed to learn that Dan is already attached, and so, she admits, is she.

She puts an end to the possible relationship, and Dan mischievously goes on an Internet chat room, posing as Anna and setting her up for a sexual encounter with Larry at the aquarium, which Anna regularly frequents.

The joke is on Dan, as Anna actually falls for the doctor, and the two start a relationship.

At the gallery opening of Anna's photography show, Anna and Dan, now in serious relationships with Larry and Alice, respectively, meet again and commence an affair. And so it goes.

None of the sexual couplings are ever shown, but the script — including that Internet chat between the two men — goes about as far as any mainstream film has ever done in its verbal frankness.

The performances are all predictably fine, with the men having a slight edge over the women, though their characters are only sporadically likable.

Though the characters' emotions are identifiably real, their actions are morally reprehensible.

And the film doesn't supply much in the way of a redemptive ending, except for these characters' lives being plainly empty, which may be Marber's point, though he has asserted he wanted to leave the moral judgments to the audience.

And for all the know-how that went into the production, and the proficient performances, "Closer" is not without dull stretches. Also, the time-shifting chronology is, at times, confusing.

In spite of its distinguished pedigree and glossy production, you may find yourself not wanting to get too close to "Closer."

Due to much gratuitously rough and sexually explicit language, a suggestive striptease, partial nudity, free-wheeling attitude towards sex, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

Human trafficking victims share stories looks, how you feel, because I was a slave for 10 years. My people are still there," said Francis Bok, 25. "What is good, your freedom, if you don't use it to help other people live in freedom?"

Bok, a native of southern Sudan, had been enslaved at age 7 to an Arab family from northern Sudan. Forced to herd goats, endure daily beatings, sleep with the animals and eat the gruel they were fed, he finally escaped.

He found refuge first in Egypt and then in the United States through the intervention of the United Nations.

"For 10 years, I used to lie awake at night and ask, who is going to come and free me? Nobody came. But I was strong and I never lost hope," Bok told a rapt audience of diplomats, journalists, students, community activists, law enforcement officials and human rights lawyers gathered at St. Thomas University in Miami Nov. 12.

He was among nearly a dozen speakers who denounced the modern slave trade during a daylong conference broadcast worldwide via the Internet.

Titled "Invisible Chains: Breaking the Ties of Trafficking in Humans," the conference featured Jim Nicholson, U.S. ambassador to the Vatican; John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; and Sister Eugenia Bonetti, a Consolata Missionary who heads anti-trafficking activities for the Union of Major Superiors of Italy.

Sister Bonetti directs the work of 250 women religious who rescue and shelter African and East European women who have been smuggled into Italy and forced to work as prostitutes.

Global epidemic

"This is the emerging human rights issue of the 21st century," said Miller, who was appointed to the newly created office to combat human trafficking just this year by President George W. Bush.

While the practice is known by the euphemism "trafficking in persons," Miller said, "it's important to call it by its rightful name — slavery."

He added that the slave trade "extends to every country in the world, including the United States."

The U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders each year. Nearly 18,000 are trafficked into the United States.

Nicholson said both the Vatican and the Bush administration view the modern slave trade as "one of the greatest affronts to dignity that the world has ever seen."

Pope John Paul II has spoken out against it, and the Holy See and the United States co-hosted the first international conference on the issue. Two others have followed.

The Vatican also has spread the word about trafficking to its 174 nuncios around the world, who in turn are making local bishops' conferences aware of the problem, Nicholson said.

According to the U.S. government, 80 percent of today's slaves are women, and 70 percent of them are forced to work in the commercial sex industry. The rest are forced to work in sweatshops and on farms, as household servants and sexual slaves, even as child warriors.

"As many as one-third (of those trafficked) and maybe more are children," said Miller.

Criminal intent

Trafficking in people is the third most profitable criminal enterprise worldwide, after arms and drug dealing, said Nicholson. "It's being done by organized crime."

Terry Coonan, executive director of Florida State University's Center for Advancement of Human Rights, said the rise in human trafficking coincided with the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989.

That historic event opened up borders and made freedom more possible for millions, but at the same time it made people susceptible to scams that lured them into servitude instead of helping them find freedom, he noted.

Coonan added that, unlike the slave trade of the 17th century, "psychological coercion is the hallmark of the new slave trade here in the United States."

Modern-day slaves come willingly, either for jobs or for love, he said. Many of the traffickers pose as boyfriends, promising women marriage — and a green card to make them legal residents — once they cross the border.

"They do know they're entering the U.S. illegally. What they don't know is that it's slavery or slavlike conditions that await them," said Coonan.

Fighting evil

Until recently, prosecution of human traffickers was nearly impossible. Victims of trafficking, already fearful for their own lives or the lives of their families back home, had no incentive to come forward because they were subject to deportation.

But, under provisions of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, victims "are now allowed to remain here legally," Coonan said, and psychological coercion is recognized under the law.

"We have not lost one slavery case, not one," said Doug Molloy, chief assistant for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Fort Myers, Fla.

As communities become more aware of trafficking and with the new laws passed by Congress, "we have a chance here to cripple this industry," he said. "America and slavery should never be in the same sentence."

Demonstrators for and against same-sex marriage converge outside the Massachusetts Statehouse in Boston March 29.

Supreme Court declines appeal of same-sex marriage law

preme Court declined Nov. 29 to hear an appeal of the ruling that permitted same-sex marriages in Massachusetts.

The court without comment passed on the chance to review the 2003 ruling by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court that legalized same-sex marriage in that state.

The challenge to the law came from the Liberty Counsel on behalf of Robert Largess, vice president of the Catholic Action League of Massachusetts, and 11 state legislators.

C.J. Doyle, the league's executive director, said the court's decision not to take the case "underscores the need for Supreme Court justices committed to a strict construction of the Constitution."

In a statement, he said the success of November ballot initiatives in 11 states to ban same-sex marriage shows "that this issue must be removed from the jurisdiction of an unaccountable judiciary and placed squarely in the hands of the people, where it belongs."

The Massachusetts Catholic Conference, the public policy arm of the state's bishops, said the court's decision not to take the case was disappointing but not a surprise.

The conference explained that the appeal was based on the argument that the state court's ruling violated a clause in the federal Constitution that requires states to maintain "a republican form of government." By ruling that the Massachusetts law defining marriage as between a man and a woman was unconstitutional, the state court usurped the Legislature's power to regulate marriage, it said in a statement.

Lower federal courts found that the constitutional argument did not apply to "separation of powers violations" and concluded that "the people of Massachusetts still retained the power to overturn" the Supreme Judicial Court with a constitutional amendment, the conference said.

"Appeals based on this clause are difficult to win," it added.

About 4,000 same-sex couples have been legally married in Massachusetts since May. The ceremonies began a few days after the federal high court turned down a request for an emergency injunction to prevent them. Massachusetts is the only U.S. state where same-sex marriages are legal.

Massachusetts legislators earlier this year approved an amendment to the state Constitution restricting marriage to heterosexual couples but allowing same-sex couples the legal benefits of civil unions. The amendment must be approved again by the 2005-06 Legislature before it goes to a popular vote.

The earliest it could appear on the state ballot is November 2006.

The U.S. Supreme Court often declines to intervene in an issue in which state governments and lower courts still are developing laws and rulings. In addition to the 11 states with ballot measures in November, another two dozen states are considering laws on same-sex marriage.

Lambda Legal, a national organization for gay rights, has filed lawsuits in California, New Jersey, New York and Washington state on behalf of same-sex couples who want to marry.

The Massachusetts Catholic Conference encouraged support for an amendment to reverse the state Supreme Judicial Court and give traditional marriage "the strongest protection possible."

The spirituality of solidarity

ADVOCACY AND INVOLVEMENT SHOULD BE A COMMUNAL RESPONSE

Photos of women draped in bright sarongs leading children through a sandy barren landscape capture the plight of the refugees in the Darfur region in western Sudan. Stories of rape and pillage told to aid workers through translators underscore the trauma and despair of a farming people forced from their land.

About 100,000 civilians have been killed in Darfur during the last two years with 400 villages destroyed and 2 million people forced to flee their homes. Neighboring Chad hosts 200,000 refugees and the human situation on both sides of the border appears desperate. Leading United Nations officials term this "the world's worst humanitarian crisis."

For people of faith, the principle of solidarity calls us to respond to the sufferings of our neighbors wherever they live in the world. But Catholics concerned about Gospel justice sense a spiritual overload. Where to begin? The sheer distance and complexity of Darfur, plus the numbers and continued violence of the tragedy, offer few realistic solutions.

Yet, from this seemingly impossible situation, believers must develop a spirituality of solidarity to move beyond their paralysis. The spirituality that makes solidarity real joins personal awareness with a communal response: Oh, God, save your people — and how can we help?

First, the spirituality of solidarity engages the situation by asking what is happening.

Basically, Sudan's central government has armed and supported a militia, the Janjeweeds, to fight on its side against rebel insurgents in Darfur. The Janjeweeds, a colloquialism translated as "horsemen with guns" or "evil horsemen," represents more of a mob of armed thugs than a militia, rampaging through villages and towns killing men and boys and raping women. Drawn mainly from pastoral peoples of different tribes, the Janjeweeds are attacking the farmers in the Darfur region to gain access to land and water for their herds.

Another element: the government, located in the northern part of the country, wants to maintain strict Islamic control over all inhabitants of Sudan, which includes large numbers of Christians in the south where huge oil reserves are located.

Economy of Faith

Sending a sufficient number of U.N. peacekeepers appears the most expedient solution to the problem, but currently a few dozen African Union monitors are only documenting abuses. Nations, it is said, have interests, not principles.

Even the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in its 1991 statement, "A Call to Solidarity with Africa," said, "Sadly, race and geographical proximity as well as economic and political factors, it seems, can disproportionately shape our nation's foreign policy." They warn the United States against writing off the world's poorest continent.

While believers advocate for a political end to the war, they can support those who are part of the solution. In Darfur, no fewer than 25 non-governmental organizations assist refugees and the victims of war. Among others, these include Catholic Relief Services, Care International, Doctors Without Borders, Oxfam and World Vision.

Amnesty International plays a key role in monitoring human rights abuses, especially with charges of genocide against the Janjeweeds and their use of rape as a weapon of war. More than resolutions and sanctions, A.I. advocates for strong U.S. leadership in three areas — "diplomacy, an arms embargo and a substantial contribution to the resettlement of the displaced." Non-governmental organizations on the ground offer a perspective beyond politics — usually that of women and children.

The spirituality of solidarity transforms what first appears to be an overwhelming human tragedy into a ministry of connectedness. By study, advocacy and involvement believers become a community of compassion while they invoke the healing power of God through prayer.

Pope: Christians must live in harmony with church social teachings

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: Due to an early publishing schedule this week, we are unable to print the story from the pope's weekly general audience.

VATICAN CITY — Christians are called to live in harmony with the church's social teachings despite fears they might not be up to the task, said Pope John Paul II.

Catholic social doctrine is "a demanding standard of justice and action," but that should not lead the faithful to feel its principles are "too great and noble" to ever be actualized in this world, he said.

The pope's message came in an address he made Dec. 4 in the Vatican to participants attending the "Centesimus Annus" Foundation's annual congress.

The pope said that since its establishment more than 10 years ago the foundation's aim has been to offer concrete support to the pope and the Holy See while making the church's teachings on social issues more widely known.

The pope remarked it was "very suitable" that the foundation was focusing this year's meeting on the "Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church."

The compendium, released Oct. 25

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

by the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, explains church social teachings, which in turn provide guidelines for living a moral, Christian life.

The pope said it occasionally seems that church social doctrine is more talked about than properly understood.

"Therefore, it's rather important to aim to introduce church social teaching in a precise, motivated, complete way," the pope said.

Catholic doctrine should be taught to be "a stimulating point of reference" for what one's social, professional and civic duties are in upholding the life and dignity of humankind, the pope said.

Catholic social doctrine also must be presented "as an element defining the spirituality of the lay faithful," he said.

"Lay Christians who are open to the grace of God are the living instruments" necessary to bring those values that foster solidarity and harmony among peoples to the fore, said the pope.

Peace lovers we should never forget

Christian duty to end conflict, hate and war

Peace should be on all our minds in these days of war, when modern weapons — the ones being used and the ones that could be used — have the potential to destroy the world.

I found it notable that Pope John Paul II recently beatified Charles I, the monarch of Austria deposed toward the end of World War I. He called him “a man of peace,” and while history may not see him exactly that way, I was pleased. I know about that war, having written with my late son Peter a book on “America at War, World War I.”

Charles inherited the monarchy at age 29 as war raged and set out to save the monarchy by searching for peace in foreign affairs. In 1917, he made a secret peace overture to the Allies (the “enemy”), which was discovered by the German-led Central Powers; he was vilified for this peace effort. Exiled to Madeira, and very poor, he died of pneumonia at age 35.

Bless the pope for remembering this man, who tried at least to seek peace.

I hope that now the pope will beatify the greatest man of peace in that time of horrendous war, Pope Benedict XV. He tried to make the world see how the warring countries had created a “horrendous bloodbath which dishonors Europe” and had turned the world into “a hospital and a cemetery.” He tried to make the countries see that they were carrying out the “darkest tragedy of human hatred and human madness” with this “useless massacre.”

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

While the countries continued the killing, Pope Benedict poured out love. He established an “Office for Prisoners” in the Vatican, making it possible for prisoners of war and soldiers at the front on all sides as far as possible to maintain contact with their families; he gave money to set up welfare works for war victims in all countries, getting them food, warm clothing and medical care; he insisted on help worldwide to ease the pain and deprivations endured by the innumerable widows and orphaned children suffering hunger and homelessness.

Later, he found a way to have the Vatican raise 5 million lire to help those starving from the Russian famine. In his efforts to relieve the suffering on all sides during this war, he spent some 82 million lire, an enormous amount of money back then, and was criticized for nearly bankrupting the Vatican.

But Pope Benedict, emphasizing Christian love, proclaimed that “it is the duty of every person to run to help another human being who is in danger of death” — and I, personally, have never heard a better definition of peace!

Jesus’ way holds the key to survival. He spoke continuously of compassion, mercy, forgiveness and overcoming hate with love. The world talks of vengeance and retaliation. Everything Jesus was about could be said to be a contradiction to the world.

Jesus never backed down, even to the death. He had to show us how to make the world right. This can only be done when we, the children of his Father, end conflict, hate, vengeance and war, and become loving people who seek forgiveness and peace.

What gifts can we give?

Seeing with God’s eyes can make a difference

Life Issues Forum

THERESA NOTARE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Advent is the time the Catholic Church asks us to prepare ourselves anew for God’s greatest gift to us — our salvation made real in the birth of his son Jesus. There is a flip side to Advent that we often forget — it also presents us with an invitation to reflect upon what gifts we can give to so generous a God.

What gifts can we give? Jesus provides a hint: “Love the Lord your God with your whole heart and soul” and “love your neighbor as yourself.” Most of us find the “love your neighbor” part difficult. And that’s understandable.

It is difficult to love people we have little in common with. In our world, the stranger is often to be feared. And forget about the people we can’t see who lie hidden in the womb. So what are we to do?

Two simple suggestions: behave as if you do love your neighbor and practice little ascetisms.

If you want to love your neighbor, act that way. It doesn’t matter if you “feel it.” The heart will eventually follow. Call your sister who you have been fighting with. Take Aunt Josie to the doctor even if you’d rather stay home. Baby-sit for the couple who live in the apartment above you. Volunteer at a pregnancy crisis center.

Above all, practice “putting on the eyes of God.” View your neighbor as God does. This means that when watching the news see both the person who was robbed and the mugger as God would.

This exercise does not excuse the mugger of his sin, but it can help us see his real value before God. It can also stoke the fires of our hearts to desire his repentance. A prayer offered with the desire for the person’s well-being delights the Lord God.

Likewise, if you have trouble summoning up concern for babies in the womb, see them as God sees them. God creates each person to do something only he or she can do. In the bustle of your routine, stop and think about who that person in the womb is and will be. Question the legality of abortion. Talk to others about the worth of all people. Pray for the well-being of “womb people.”

Finally, practice little ascetisms. The ancient practice of “giving something up,” or more specifically “fasting,” needs to be integrated into our lives. Even fasting only one day a week “tunes up” the soul. When we give something up for a higher purpose, we can see our sins more easily. We can see the talents God gave us to spend in the world.

We also can see what God wants of us. Our innate compassion is more readily available. Our desire to help stirs. Our heart-felt prayers for our neighbors become a natural response.

This Advent, give gifts to God. Put on the “eyes of the Lord.” Include a bit of fasting with your prayers. If we all strive to do this, we may see peace in the world. We will also make beautiful gifts for our heavenly Father.

Grown men don’t resort to violence

Coming of Age

KASE JOHNSTUN
CNS COLUMNIST

Children fight because they get called names. Children fly off the handle because someone throws something at them. Children throw tantrums when things don’t go their way. Children don’t yet know how to control their temper when they get angry.

Children act like children. Sometime in later childhood, they learn to control these violent feelings.

I sat with my parents that recent night as ESPN replayed the fight between the Indiana Pacers and the Detroit Pistons. I admit, at first, I wanted to see it. They showed a quick highlight, and I became intrigued, calling in everyone from other rooms to come watch.

There is something about fights that make people gather around, that intrigues everyone. Fights gather crowds. Fights form circles of spectators.

“Hey, get in here. You might miss it. They are going to show a huge fight on TV,” I yelled throughout my apartment.

Everyone came. Everyone watched. They, of course, could not and would not miss the fight as it appeared everywhere over a two-week span on magazine covers, radio shows, talk shows, highlights and press conferences.

On display were the actions of children. Flying fists and swarming mobs lit up our homes to begin the holiday season. These men acted no older than the average 8-year-old.

A fan threw a cup (wrong) and a player ran to the stands to get revenge, to release his temper, to show everyone he wouldn’t take it. He lost his temper. Another player ran into the fans, and the cycle continued.

Men should not fight because they get called names, fly off the handle because someone throws a soda on them or throw tantrums when things don’t go their way.

Men should know how to control their temper when they get angry.

It’s unacceptable for men to resort to violence because a cup of soda hits them, setting a bad example for millions of kids watching at home.

The nation already has commented on this fight. Everyone has expressed an opinion, some berating the players, some actually defending them and some, already conditioned to such violence, scoffing at the controversy.

I cannot add anything to the global discussion of professional athletes and their responsibility as role models, nor can I give any new insight into the fight that happened in Detroit. Although tempted, I will not review the history of the professional athlete and fighting, nor will I quote players in the past as they tell the nation that parents should be role models, not athletes.

New St. James Church serves as spiritual home to Concord Catholics

CONCORD — In the 1800s, Cabarrus County Catholics, like many others in the state, had to travel elsewhere for Mass.

Joseph Barnhardt, a convert to Catholicism, dreamed of having a church built in Concord, but died in 1858 before he could help plan it. But when Barnhardt's father-in-law died in 1869, he deeded a picturesque plot of land for the future church.

With the help of the Concord-area Catholics, the first St. James Church was built and dedicated on Aug. 1, 1869. Father Joseph J. O'Connell, who would later write a book about Catholicism in the South, became the first pastor of the parish.

In the 1950s, a parishioner named J.B. Williams attempted to buy a piece of property inside the town for the church. When non-Catholic residents discovered his intention for it, he was immediately outbid. A short time later, another property was auctioned and he purchased the property and turned it over to the church. This became the property on which the former church stands.

The first pastors of the church were Benedictine priests from Belmont Abbey and other areas of the diocese. In 1944, Bishop Vincent Waters of the Diocese of Raleigh (which covered all of North Carolina) asked Redemptorist fathers to begin priestly ministry work at St. Joseph Church, built in 1945 in nearby Kannapolis. In 1974, the Redemptorist fathers came to St. James Church and remain today.

In 1954, Charlie Williams, a St. James parishioner, started an annual barbecue to raise money for the church. The event, open to the entire community, became the largest fundraising project for the church.

In August 1969, St. Joseph Church became a mission of St. James Church. Redemptorist Father Alvaro Riquelme, a current parochial vicar of St. James in Concord, now serves as St. Joseph's pastor.

In a double celebration July 31, 1994, then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated a new 12,000-square-foot parish center — complete with 11 classrooms, a large central area and a kitchen — and helped commemorate the church's 125th anniversary. The parish was presented with a proclamation signed by Concord Mayor George Liles declaring that date as "St. James Catholic Church anniversary day."

In 1993, Redemptorist Father Daniel Carboy, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel, became pastor of both St. James and St. Joseph. In 1994, Father Carboy started an endowment for the church with a $4,000 donation from a parishioner. By 1997, the endowment, used to generate funds for the church, had grown to $30,000.

In 1995, St. James Church hosted its first "Jimmy Murphy's Christmas Dinner," an event to bring people of the growing parish and community together on Christmas Day.

Bishop Jugis announces activities for Year of the Eucharist

CONGRESS SCHEDULED
IN CHARLOTTE FOR 2005

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO

THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — In a letter to Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte, Bishop Peter J. Jugis announced that a Eucharistic Congress will take place in Charlotte Sept. 23-24, 2005.

Asking the faithful to put aside those dates to attend the congress, Bishop Jugis said, "This will be a time of celebration, adoration and catechesis centered on the mystery of the Eucharist."

The congress will include eucharistic adoration and sacred music on Friday Sept. 23. Saturday, Sept. 24, begins with a procession in which choirs, Catholic organizations such as the Knights of Columbus, and members from all 92 parishes and missions in the diocese will walk behind the Eucharist as it is carried through the streets of uptown Charlotte.

After the procession, a day of seminars, speakers and activities for adults, youths and children is planned at the Charlotte Convention Center. Programs for Hispanic and other cultures will also be presented.

The Eucharistic Congress concludes with a Mass on Saturday afternoon.

Children present a Christmas pageant re-enacting the Nativity as Father Carl Del Giudice, pastor, reads the story at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard Dec. 12. Father Del Giudice told the children, "This is the third Sunday of Advent, and, as our pageant reminds us, Jesus is coming to give us light." At a breakfast after the Mass, the children had a birthday cake for Jesus and then made Christmas tree ornaments.

Hispanic parishioners celebrate heritage, history

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA — Going to Mass on a cold Dec. 9, 1531, Juan Diego passed Tepeyac Hill, near Mexico City. He saw a cloud and a rainbow, heard music; a woman called his name. Climbing the 130-foot hill, he saw a beautiful woman dressed as an Aztec princess, who told him she was the Virgin Mary.

It was Mary's appearances to Juan Diego (canonized July 31, 2002) and the resulting miracles that converted 9 million Aztecs to Catholicism. Hispanic people throughout the United States and Latin America continue to celebrate that event each Dec. 12. In Mexico, people make pilgrimages to the Basilica of Guadalupe on that day.

Churches in the Diocese of Charlotte, including Sacred Heart Church in Brevard and Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, hold lavish celebrations to honor Our Lady of Guadalupe, named "Patroness of the Americas" in 1946.

ILLUMINATING WASHINGTON

President George W. Bush and first lady Laura Bush assist Clara Pitts, left, and Nicole Mastracchio, members of St. Timothy School Brownie troop 5179 from Chantilly, Va., as they light the national Christmas tree near the White House Dec. 2.

Brownies from Virginia Catholic school light national Christmas tree

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Nicole Mastracchio and Clara Pitts, third-graders at St. Timothy School in Chantilly, Va., excitedly flipped the switch Dec. 2 and 450 sets of lights, donated by General Electric Co., illuminated the national Christmas tree as thousands of people standing on the Ellipse watched.

Nicole and Clara are two of St. Timothy School's third-grade Brownies who collected lip balm, chewing gum, candy, tissues, sunscreen and handmade cards to send to troops overseas. The eight girls of Brownie Troop No. 5179 collected more than 200 pounds of supplies and assembled nearly 1,000 care packages.

With the help of a law firm, the packages were shipped to the troops in Iraq in time to be received before the holidays.

The Brownies wrote to President George W. Bush to tell him about their Christmas project and invite him to the school, but instead they were invited to the White House Ellipse to help the president and first lady Laura Bush light the national Christmas tree.

"Across our country, citizens are supporting our people in uniform with their prayers and with many acts of kindness," the president said at the "Pageant of Peace" lighting ceremony. "And I thank the Brownies for reminding the good people of our military how much they mean to America."

Although the other six Brownies were not able to sit onstage, they and their parents had seats close to the stage and enjoyed dancing onstage and posing for photos after the ceremony.

All eight girls wore their plaid St. Timothy uniforms and Brownie vests and were topped with matching fuzzy black berets. They had all signed a St. Timothy School baseball hat that they gave to President Bush.

Clara said her favorite part was turning the switch that lit the tree. About 15,000 colored lights illuminate the 42-foot Colorado blue spruce that has been decorated as the national Christmas tree for more than 20 years.

Although they didn't get to spend much time with the president, Clara said Laura Bush talked to her during the ceremony, asking if she was having fun and pointing out interesting things happening on stage.

"All the other people out there (in the audience) didn't get to do much," Clara said. "But we got to light the Christmas tree."

Consideration for family central to development efforts, says nuncio

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican nuncio to the United Nations said Dec. 6 that international concern for development should lead to support for the family unit as indispensable to achieving security and development in any nation.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore said the family as "the stable and lasting union of a man and a woman" not only ensures the "replacement of the generations" but enables a child to become a "creative constructor of society."

The nuncio made his statement to a session of the U.N. General Assembly marking the 10th anniversary of the 1994 International Year of the Family.

Archbishop Migliore was among those who took the initiative last year to ensure that the anniversary observance would not be left up to individual governments, but marked by the United Nations as a body through activities including a session of the General Assembly.

"As the first place of formation of human capital, the family appears truly indispensable to development," he said.

Archbishop Migliore called for a governmental family policy as something separate and distinct, rather than just one aspect of some more comprehensive social policy.

He said a family policy should prevent measures that penalize couples who wish to have children and provide "just compensation" of education costs linked and "a true recognition of domestic work."

It should also include "a long-term action, based on criteria of justice and of efficiency," he said, "because the family is an investment for tomorrow."

Iraqi foreign minister says government will promote religious freedom

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshiyar Zebari thanked Pope John Paul II for the help he always has given the Iraqi people, and he pledged that the country's new government would promote full religious freedom.

The foreign minister met Pope John Paul II Dec. 13, exactly one year after U.S. troops captured Saddam Hussein and less than a week after an Armenian Catholic Church and a Chaldean Catholic bishop's residence were damaged in an attack by armed men.

Joaquin Navarro-Valls, Vatican spokesman, said Zebari assured the pope of "the commitment of his government to promote religious freedom and, particularly, the defense of the Christian communities."

"The painful plague of terrorism" was condemned during the meetings, Navarro-Valls said.

In addition to Dec. 7 attacks by terrorists on Catholic targets, five Christian churches in Baghdad were struck in mid-October, and five Catholic churches were the targets of bombings in August.

Also Dec. 13, Fides, the Vatican's missionary news agency, published an interview with Chaldean Catholic Archbishop Louis Sako of Kirkuk.

The archbishop said he and other religious leaders have asked their faithful to focus on prayers for peace and security at Christmas, rather than hostilities and parties.

With the ongoing mourning and suffering, he said, it did not seem right to celebrate Christmas with the customary parties.

Also, he said, most Iraqi Muslims could not have big feasts during November of Ramadan, the month of fasting, so giving up the Christmas parties is also an act of solidarity.

Pope says Christians must help create world open to diverse cultures

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians must help create an open and harmonious world where diverse cultures can thrive side by side, said Pope John Paul II.

The faithful must "foster, with active commitment, prospects of hope that will herald the dawn of a more open and supportive society," the pope said Dec. 9 in his annual message for the World Day for Migrants and Refugees.

The annual event is held on different days in different countries. In the United States, National Migration Week will be celebrated Jan. 2-8.

While the Christian community must still "listen for the cry of help that comes from a multitude of migrants and refugees," the faithful must reach out with sincere respect and curiosity in learning about the culture and beliefs of others, said the pope.

He said the goal of "intercultural integration" entails firsthand contact with the newcomers, which "leads to discovering their 'secret,' or rather, the values and beliefs of their culture."

Being open and understanding of other cultures can result, in the long run, in a pluralistic society that reflects "the multifaceted gifts of God to human beings," he said.

Cardinal Stephen Fumio Hamao, president of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, said immigrants often suffer from gross social inequalities.

"It is necessary to work to remove the obstacles to social equality" for immigrants because an intercultural society "necessitates equal standing among peoples," he said.

But while the values of equality and liberty are to be embraced, the faithful must not loosen their grasp of their Christian identity and mission of evangelization, he added.

Divine Word Father Michael Blume, the council's undersecretary, said the United States was the nation hosting the largest number of immigrants in the world. The United States has some 35 million people who come from 40 different nations.

Part of making immigrants feel comfortable in expressing and developing their own cultural identity lies in recognizing "the beneficial contribution" that the immigrant makes to society "with his and her culture and talents," said Father Blume.

Intercultural integration results in "reciprocal enrichment, and society becomes a kaleidoscope, where every culture has its place in one design made all the more beautiful" for its variety, he said.

Parishioners celebrate diversity at inaugural event

BY VERONICA ANTHONY

SPECIAL TO

THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

NORTH WILKESBORO — Parishioners of St. John Baptist de la Salle Church celebrated their inaugural Heritage Day Nov. 28.

The multicultural event was held after the Sunday Spanish-language Mass. Parishioners were invited to bring foods from their countries of origin to the celebration, which featured Mexican dishes, German kielbasa and kraut, Oriental slaw, Italian baked rigatoni, Guatemalan tamales and Pakistani saweean.

"People did a wonderful job, and the event was a great success," said Mary Sorel, parish faith formation director, who organized the event with the parish Hispanic Leadership Team.

Other activities included games, musical chairs, sack races and live music provided by the Luz Christo Band, a family music group from Lenoir. Children also broke open two piñatas and collected the candy.

Many parishioners considered the Heritage Day a great success in bringing together parishioners of different ethnic backgrounds. The next Heritage Day is already scheduled for Nov. 27, 2005.

The drive is phase three of four in the council's 2004 Operation LAMB (Least Among My Brethren) campaign, which runs Sept. 1-Dec. 31.

More than 160 volunteers — Knights, confirmation candidates, Boy and Girl Scouts and other parishioners — took turns standing in all weather conditions for 106 hours primarily during Thanksgiving week, giving away Tootsie Rolls and accepting donations in an effort to help people with mental retardation.

Operation LAMB is a 30-year-old state-wide program, with all 16 councils in North Carolina participating at various levels. In three decades, the councils have raised more than $140,000.

The Knights are accepting donations, which are tax-deductible, from individuals and businesses through Dec. 31. For more information, visit www.kofcncstmark.org.

Taking stands on the issues

John Carr discusses social teaching, politics

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — For the last decade, John Carr has served as director of the Department of Social Development and World Peace of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

He assists the bishops in sharing and applying Catholic social teaching, advocating on the moral dimensions of key domestic and international issues, and building the Catholic community's capacity to act on its social mission.

Carr spoke during a Just Second Fridays gathering at St. Peter Church in Charlotte Dec. 10. Just Second Fridays' speakers are arranged through the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace.

Carr also spoke with The Catholic News & Herald about the role of Catholic social teaching.

CN&H: How does the Department of Social Development and World Peace come up with the topics that it chooses to present?

CARR: The most important thing to know about the bishops' conference is that it is the bishops' conference. They set the priorities and policies.

We serve two committees, one on domestic policy and one on international policy. They will meet in mid-December and decide what policies will continue to guide our work.

Any statement that the bishops wish to make has to go to an administrative committee of 60 bishops and ultimately the full body of bishops.

CN&H: What sort of role do the bishops want these statements to play?

CARR: Our work is a work of faith, not politics. The bishops lead a community of faith, not an interest group. What the bishops' conference brings to the dialogue is a set of moral principles on human life and dignity as well as broad experience in serving the "least among us" at home and around the world.

The bishops bring a moral voice to what is very often a partisan discussion. In many ways, we don't fit the political categories of right and left, Democrat or Republican. We're not politically correct. For example, there are very few groups in Washington that stand up for the life of the unborn and are trying to restrict the death penalty.

CN&H: From talk radio to cable television to an endless stream of the written word, there is a cacophony of discourse in the United States. How effective are these statements from the bishops?

CARR: In many ways, Catholic teaching and the position of the bishops' conference are counter-cultural. The church doesn't decide where it stands based on the polls or the focus groups. We're not free to abandon the unborn because they may not be politically correct or to forget about immigrants because they don't vote.

The way the bishops make a difference is by being persistent and consistent. For example, the partial birth abortion ban was passed after 10 years of work.

CN&H: In an essay about the presidential campaign, you said, "There's no magic message or quick strategy." To what were you referring?

CARR: To be candid, the "least among us" were missing from the campaign. Neither candidate really talked about them much. So, the bishops have to inform, educate and persuade people and leaders that we ought to focus on the needs of the weak, not the wishes of the strong, on the search for the common good, instead of the narrow demands of the powerful interests.

It is our faith, the Gospel and the Eucharist that sustains us in these difficult tasks.

CN&H: During the summer, several bishops, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis, released statements that restricted politicians who support abortion from receiving Communion. Do you have any reflection on the notion that the bishops are becoming partisans because of their dedication to the whole issue of abortion?

CARR: Some people in the media and some partisans misunderstood the role of bishops in public life. Bishops were acting as pastors and teachers, not political partisans. Some people called these bishops partisan, and others (bishops) who took a different course were called cowards.

The bishops I know conscientiously tried to meet their responsibilities as pastors and teachers in a very polarized political climate and all of them are striving to be faithful to the Gospel of Life and Catholic social teaching.

CN&H: Is it a good thing for the social mission of the church when the bishops take a stand in a polarized political climate?

CARR: Yes. I spend a lot of time moving around the country, talking to priests and parishioners and I have found people wrestling with more thought and urgency than I've ever experienced over what it meant to be a Catholic and an American, a believer and a voter.

This is a good thing for our church and our nation.

Principal honored with retirement reception, Mass

GREENSBORO — Hundreds of children and adults from Our Lady of Grace School and parish gathered to bid farewell to a dear friend and educator.

Roberta Hutchcraft, who recently retired as principal of Our Lady of Grace School, was honored with a reception Dec. 5 for her 20 years of service to the school and 35 years of service to the Diocese of Charlotte.

Many former students and their parents returned for the occasion. Teachers, staff members and parents prepared and served food, and decorated the school gymnasium for the reception.

First-grader Kristen McCain watches as Roberta Hutchcraft, principal of Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro, prepares to cut a cake at a reception in Hutchcraft's honor Dec. 5. Hutchcraft is retiring this month after 20 years of service to the school and 35 years of service to the Diocese of Charlotte.

Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church, opened the celebration with prayers and invited those in attendance to extend their hands over Hutchcraft as he offered a blessing.

Seventh-grader Keirnan Campbell and his mother, Alicia, performed on the flute and cello during the reception, followed by Richard Valitutto, a senior at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, on the piano.

Those in attendance signed a guest book. One student wrote, "Thank you for everything you have meant to me. You will be in my heart forever and ever."

Father Andrew Latsko, chaplain for Pennybyrn at Maryfield retirement community, celebrated the school-wide Mass dedicated to Hutchcraft on her last day of work, Dec. 15.

"It has been an honor and a pleasure to work with Roberta," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools. "She is a person who cares about her students and her faculty and staff."

"She will be missed by our school office staff and me. The Diocese of Charlotte has been blessed to have had her service for over 30 years," said Cherry. "While we envy her early retirement, we wish her much happiness and success in her restful years ahead."

"Our prayers are with Ms. Hutchcraft as she begins this new chapter of her life," said Shirley Kinslaw, assistant to the principal. "Along with her go the love and heartfelt gratitude of her Our Lady of Grace School family."

Kinslaw will serve at the interim principal until a replacement is named.

N.C. Representative Doug Vinson and former Mecklenburg County Commissioner Dan Ramirez take questions from fourth-graders at St. Matthew School in Charlotte Oct. 25.

Student research inspires school-wide election on 'kid-friendly issues'

CHARLOTTE — Civics and public service recently came alive for Catholic school students during an hour-long chat with politicians.

Dan Ramirez, a then-Mecklenburg County commissioner, and Doug Vinson, newly-elected N.C. House representative to District 105, took part in an hour-long discussion about their experiences as public servants at St. Matthew School Oct. 25.

As part of their curriculum, students in Jacqui Marquez's and Natalie Terrio's fourth-grade classes have been studying government, civic responsibility and the election. They were excited to have Ramirez and Vinson as guests and posed a number of questions about their work.

Inspired by the guest speakers and their research, the fourth-graders initiated a school-wide vote on "kid-friendly issues" such as Music in Before School Care, Free Nuts Day, Wear a Hat Day and Wear Your PJs to School Day.

Marquez's class created posters to raise awareness about a "vote that will count for the kids." Parent volunteers created color-coded ballot boxes in which the students could vote on Election Day, Nov. 2.

Students overwhelmingly voted for Wear Your PJs to School Day, which was celebrated Dec. 17.

OUR LADY OF GUADALUPE

Hispanics celebrate heritage

Church at dawn on Dec. 12 to conclude a novena to Our Lady of Guadalupe.

"They wait until the dawn comes; they say the night is gone," said Jose Gonzalez, Sacred Heart Church's Hispanic ministry coordinator.

Prior to the 11 a.m. Mass at Sacred Heart Church, Hispanic and Anglo parishioners processed around the church parking lot, accompanied by the four-piece Los Mariachis Mexicanos musical group from Gastonia, and carrying a statue of Our Lady of Guadalupe. Father Carl Del Giudice, pastor, and visiting Father Oscar Gracious concelebrated. A Hispanic potluck dinner followed the Mass.

Father Gracious, of the Missionary Fraternity of Mary, is in the Asheville Vicariate Nov. 29-Dec. 21 on a break from teaching at his order's seminary in Guatemala City, Guatemala. It's his third year assisting — hearing confessions, assisting pastors with Hispanic Masses, conducting marriage and church workshops and blessing houses.

Sacred Heart Church has about 30 registered Hispanic parishioners but many more come to the Hispanic Mass he celebrates on Sundays.

"I tell the Hispanic community, in this church it's Mexico during Mass," Father Del Giudice said.

The Sacred Heart of Jesus is the church's patron; it also has taken Our Lady of Guadalupe as its patroness.

"She's the patroness of the Americas and of oppressed peoples," Father Del Giudice explained. "As a parish, we're trying to grow together. People move here from all over the world."

In Hendersonville, Immaculate Conception Church's 750 Hispanic parishioners usually fill the church for the Sunday 1 p.m. Hispanic Mass, but that nearly doubled as an estimated 1,400 people filled both pews and aisles on Dec. 12.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Capuchin Franciscan Father John Salvias, Immaculate Conception Church's parochial vicar, concelebrated Mass after walking in the procession with a nearly life-size statue of Our Lady of Guadalupe from Jackson Park, three-quarters of a mile from the church.

After the statue was placed in a red-, white-, and green-balloon bedecked arch in the sanctuary, and before Mass began, dancers dressed as Aztecs performed.

During Mass, some 22 children in white formal gowns and tuxedos received their first Communion.

Following the Mass, people crowded around the statue, bringing flowers to augment the pots and vases of blossoms already there. Then everyone gathered in the nearby Immaculata School gym for a Hispanic dinner, with dancing following a re-enactment of Mary's appearances to Juan Diego, the Indian peasant who became a saint.

The day was special, said parishioner Guillermo Elias, because "Mary came to people who didn't have much."

THE HISTORY OF OUR LADY OF GUADALUPE

It was Mary's appearances to Juan Diego (canonized July 31, 2002) and the resulting miracles that Hispanic people throughout the United States and Latin America celebrate on Dec. 12.

Passing Tepeyac Hill near Mexico City on his way to Mass on Dec. 9, 1531, Juan Diego, a peasant, heard a beautiful woman dressed as an Aztec princess call his name.

According to "The History of Our Lady of Guadalupe," (found on the Secular Franciscan History Web site) Juan climbed the hill to the woman, who told him, "Know for certain, my dearest of my sons, that I am the perfect and perpetual Virgin Mary, Mother of the True God, through whom everything lives, the Lord of all things, who is Master of Heaven and Earth."

Mary told Juan to tell the bishop in Mexico City that she wanted a temple built on the hill. It took three trips and a miracle to convince Bishop Juan Zumarraga.

At the time, Aztecs were ready to fight against a "cruel, harsh" Spanish administrator. Bishop Zumarraga appealed to the Spanish king to replace the administrator. The bishop also prayed privately to Mary, asking for her help and that she send "Castilian roses, unknown in Mexico, as a sign that his desperate prayer had been heard."

After his second visit to the bishop, Juan Diego found Castilian roses and other flowers growing on frozen Tepeyac Hill. He gathered the flowers in his tilma (cape) and carried them to the bishop.

"Juan related the events of the day on Tepeyac and then opened his tilma to allow the flowers, mingled with the Castilian roses for which the bishop had secretly prayed, to fall to the floor," the Web site says. "At the moment they looked up, the image of Our Lady appeared on the tilma."

When Juan Diego returned home, he found that his uncle, who had been ill, was well, as Mary had promised. The uncle, according to the Web site, said that Mary had told him that she wanted to be called the "Ever Virgin, Holy Mary of Guadalupe." This further astounded the bishop. Guadalupe had no meaning in Mexico. It was the name of a famous Marian shrine in Spain.

Bishop Zumarraga, a Franciscan friar, would have known the shrine well, since a Franciscan monastery had been built there to enshrine a statue of Mary holding the child Jesus.

Word of the miraculous cape spread, and 9 million Aztecs converted to Catholicism.

The tilma is preserved in the Basilica of Guadalupe in Mexico City. Normally, cactus-fiber capes last about 20 years, but this tilma is intact 473 years after the image appeared upon it.

Our Lady of Guadalupe was named "Patroness of the Americas" in 1946.

ANGELS IN NORTH CAROLINA

Many work to bring gifts to needy families

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Catholic Social Services Western Regional Office collected 557 gifts and gift certificates for its 2004 Angel Tree program.

Angel Tree planning began last summer, as coordinators from parishes and missions in the Asheville and Smoky Mountain vicariates began working with the CSS office.

"Catholic Social Services' mission is to provide help, create hope and change lives," said Holly Carter, CSS administrative support specialist, who coordinated the program.

"You will also find parents who will use their gift cards to buy gifts for their children," Carter said. "At CSS, we just feel we need to be empowering families. The gift certificate is a way to do that."

Some donors like to shop for gifts.

"(Parents) would take their kids with them to shop for the gifts and the kids could help pick out the gifts and wrap them," said Jerry Bergeron, Angel Tree coordinator at St. Eugene Church in Asheville.

Program guidelines stated that someone in the parish or organization must know the person or family and their needs and could verify the situation.

Participating parishes were Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews; St. Barnabas Church in Arden; the Basilica of St. Lawrence, St. Eugene Church and St. Joan of Arc Church in Asheville; St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill; St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa; and St. John the Baptist Church in Tryon.

Additional participants were the Jesuit House of Prayer in Hot Springs; St. Vincent de Paul Society in Asheville; CSS Western Regional Office's Asheville Legal Migration Assistance and Russian Refugee programs, and Lilies of the Field Food Pantry, which is housed at, but not run by, the CSS office.

Those wanting to help picked envelopes from trees at their locations, bought and wrapped gifts, and attached the Angel Tree envelopes to the packages, or put gift certificates in the envelopes.

Each family member received a $25 gift or gift certificates to local stores. Each household also received a food certificate for a local grocery chain.

"We had excellent participation," said Bobbie Tinsley, coordinator for the basilica. "It turned out really well."

Bravo, 'Brother Burro'

Secular Franciscans re-enact nativity in Hickory

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — The cattle were lowing and the donkeys were braying, just as they probably did in Greccio, Italy, in 1223 when St. Francis of Assisi organized the first re-enactment of the birth of Christ.

Denny Schell, who played St. Francis in the fifth annual Crib at Greccio re-enactment in Hickory Dec. 5, had his reading of the Our Father prayer interrupted by a donkey braying nearby. Staying in character, he responded, "Well said, Brother Burro! Well said."

Schell has played the role of St. Francis for all five years that the Hickory secular Franciscan group has sponsored the re-enactment at the Catholic Conference Center. Most of the other parts were played by youths and parishioners from St. Joseph Church in Newton.

Each year, the Brother Francis Fraternity includes different stories from the life of St. Francis, as well as the nativity scene. This year's program included a visit that St. Francis made to an Egyptian sultan in an attempt to convert him to Christianity. It also featured a scene in which St. Francis discussed his idea of perfect joy — being shunned because of his faith — with Brother Leo, a follower of his.

During the nativity re-enactment, Schell recited the account of the birth of Jesus in the Gospel of Luke, and also read the Our Father with comments according to St. Francis.

John Martin, a local veterinarian, organizes the play and writes the script each year. He also gathers the animals for the event, which this year included a cow, llama, sheep, goats, donkeys and ponies.

Ruth Thoni, minister of the group, said it was her late husband Herman, who wanted to include live animals in the re-enactment.

"It was his dream to have a live nativity with real people and animals," she said. "John Martin took up the cause. He has enlarged the scope of the project each year by adding different stories from the life of St. Francis."

Some musicians and members of St. Joseph Church participating in the re-enactment were Danny Aberle as Brother Leo, Tracy Schell as Sir John of Velita, Gerry Burke as the pope, John Robinson as Joseph, Maria Schell as Mary, Colin Barrett as the Egyptian sultan and 7-month-old Maia Dunmore as the baby Jesus.

Vatican publishes bigger, more accurate calendar of saints

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Three years after finishing the massive project of updating and correcting the book-length calendar of Catholic saints, the Vatican has published an even bigger, more accurate version.

The "Martyrologium Romanum" ("Roman Martyrology") was presented Dec. 4 during a conference on holiness and the complicated task of separating fact from legend when dealing with martyrs and saints who lived and died thousands of years ago and whose lives gave rise to fervent devotion and, perhaps, fanciful stories.

Like the 2001 edition, the newest volume is available only in Latin; however, officials of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments said Italian, French and German translations are under way.

The martyrology — with its 6,658 individual names and an additional 6,881 unnamed martyred "companions" — is organized as a calendar; it lists the saints and blesseds whose feast is celebrated each day and provides a small biography of each.

The 844-page martyrology is considered a liturgical book, not a catalogue or history, because it forms the basis for determining which saint is remembered at Mass each day.

The Italian newspaper Il Messaggero conducted a study of the names in the volume's index.

The most common first name for a saint or blessed, it reported Dec. 5, is John with more than 330 entries. Maria or Mary is second with more than 250 entries.

The top five is rounded out with Peter, Joseph and Francis.

The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments said the revised martyrology includes 117 individuals who were not in the 2001 edition: 66 of those were beatified by Pope John Paul between the time the last volume went to press and April 2004, the deadline for the current volume.

The other 51 new names were those added after research proved that they, too, had authorized feast days.

New saints canonized by Pope John Paul during the period did not have to be added to the book, since they already were listed as blessed. Now, though, it points out they are saints.

Revising the martyrology was complicated, said a statement from the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments. The Vatican did not consolidate the process for declaring saints until the late 1500s, instituting procedures — strengthened over the years — to ensure the church had firm facts about the identity and lives of the individuals canonized.

Still, the congregation said, "the Roman Martyrology does not aim to be a complete list of all the saints of the church. The presence of a saint within it simply means there is certainty that devotion approved by the church exists."

"On the other hand, the absence of a name either denotes the lack of an officially authorized devotion or that, in the presence of reasonable doubts (about the person's identity), it did not seem opportune to propose the person for the devotion of the universal church," the statement said.

Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for Saints' Causes, said the growing number of individuals beatified and canonized is part of the Catholic Church's pastoral obligation to remind every Christian that they are called to holiness.

"The church would be aiming way too low if it did not propose as the goal of every Christian the radicalism of the Sermon on the Mount," he said.

Cardinal Saraiva Martins said Pope John Paul has beatified 1,345 individuals and has proclaimed 483 new saints.

Many of them, he said, "are common Christians who, in their concrete situations, lived the Gospel fully. They are not geniuses, but normal women and men who, in imitating Christ, lived their lives heroically."

The cardinal offered Blessed Peter Friedhofen as an example. The 41-year-old, beatified in 1985, "was a chimneysweep ... On the tapestries that hang in St. Peter's Square (during the ceremonies), never before was there a blessed chimneysweep. It took John Paul II for that."

Il Messaggero also credited Pope John Paul with increasing the percentage of women among those recognized as holy by the church.

FACING CHALLENGES WITH GOD'S SUPPORT

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The summer before my senior year of high school, my father announced that his company was moving him to the headquarters office in New York.

Wow, Dad, way to go! I shared his and Mom's excitement, even though I assumed I'd be staying in Chalmette, La., where I'd attended my first 11 years of school. I'd simply stay that last year with my friend Christine so I could graduate there.

"Whatever gave you that idea?" they asked, as surprised by my assumption as I was by their question. "Of course, you will move with the family."

I thought: "Of course?"

I went. I didn't whine or beg or pitch a fit or even ask again to stay because, as they said, "Of course ..."

What happened during that next year, although not dramatic, would define the person I am. It was my first experience of stepping out of my comfort zone, figuratively stripped of my identity (which I'd worked so hard on those last four years) and thrown into an unknown culture.

For me it was a year of unimagined personal growth born of new perspectives, new friends, new opportunities, new courage and, "of course," the family.

As I ventured out they encouraged me; as I sought new friends they provided security; as I considered new possibilities they nurtured me. Throughout a time of testing, my family held me in a safe embrace and allayed my fears, enabling me to grow.

The same was true for Dad in his new position, Mom as she entered a new community, my brother in junior high and even my sister who joined us when her husband was sent to Vietnam for military duty.

We went out and faced new challenges, but always came home to the security of the family.

The Holy Family is so like our God: supporting us, giving us courage, comforting and healing us when we fail or get hurt, forgiving us when we turn away — and always waiting with arms open to us.

In this weekend's Gospel, Joseph faces many concerns, unknowns and even threats to his family. But he doesn't go off on his own to solve his problems or send his wife and child away. They must go together, "of course," and God's will is fulfilled.

Father Clarence Rivers, African-American liturgy pioneer, dead at 73

Priest remembered for profound musical, spiritual contributions

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CINCINNATI — Father Clarence J. Rivers, a pioneer African-American liturgist and musician, died unexpectedly Nov. 21 at his home in Cincinnati. He was 73.

He was buried Nov. 27 at Gate of Heaven Cemetery in Cincinnati following a funeral Mass celebrated by Cincinnati Archbishop Daniel E. Pilarczyk at the Cathedral of St. Peter in Chains.

The first African-American to be ordained in the Cincinnati Archdiocese, Father Rivers "was an iconic figure for the black Catholic community throughout the country," Archbishop Pilarczyk said.

"He was a member of the presbyterate that few of us will ever forget," the archbishop said. "He made a significant contribution to black Catholic liturgy."

Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory of Atlanta said: "Father Clarence Rivers was a musical and cultural genius who provided great pride for African-American Catholics by composing music for the Catholic liturgy that clearly and proudly reflected the cultural gifts of black people in our country."

Bishop Gregory, who recently completed his term as the first African-American president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said Father Rivers' music "brought the church closer to African-Americans while at the same time enriching the Catholic Church with a spiritual vibrancy and artistic expression that crossed all racial barriers."

"The church in the United States has lost a pioneer musician, liturgist and cultural treasure," he said.

Father Rivers was the author of several books, including "Soulful Worship" and "The Spirit in Worship," and wrote numerous liturgical compositions and countless articles, and delivered many lectures and presentations on liturgy and liturgical music.

He deliberately misspelled the title of "Soulful Worship" to call attention to the meaning of "soulful."

He first came to national attention in 1963, during the Second Vatican Council, with the recording of "An American Mass Program." It was a series of compositions blending Gregorian chant with the melodic patterns and rhythmic traditions of Negro spirituals that he had developed to promote more active participation in the liturgy at St. Joseph Parish in Cincinnati, where he was then a 32-year-old assistant pastor.

"An American Mass Program" received wide critical acclaim and was heralded as the start of a revolution in American Catholic liturgical music. It was used in parishes across the country and received a gold medal from the Catholic Art Association in 1966.

Clarence Joseph Rufus Rivers Jr. was born in Selma, Ala., on Sept. 9, 1931. His family wasn't Catholic, but when they moved to Cincinnati his parents enrolled him in the fourth grade at St. Ann School. Eventually the entire family became Catholic.

He decided to study for the priesthood midway through high school and was ordained a priest in 1956. As the Cincinnati Archdiocese's first black priest, he had to endure racism from the start. The first parish to which he was assigned did not accept him and he was transferred after a short time to St. Joseph's.

In 1965 Archbishop Karl Alter of Cincinnati released Father Rivers from his teaching and parish assignments to work full time on Stimuli, his program of inculturating African-American culture with Catholic worship.

In 1971, the National Office of Black Catholics named him to head its newly created Department of Culture and Worship. He started the office's yearly national workshop on African-American liturgy, "Freeing the Spirit," which made its debut in Detroit in 1971 with about 1,000 participants. The workshops gave rise to a magazine on African-American liturgy of the same name, with Father Rivers as the editor.

In a 1977 interview, he described himself as a "cheerleader" who tried to enliven congregations, giving them the full experience of participation, rather than instructing them on the technicalities of music and worship.

The African-American Catholic hymnal, "Lead Me, Guide Me," is dedicated to Father Rivers. The dedication says he "paved the way for liturgical inculturation and inspired black Catholics to bring their artistic genius to Catholic worship."

Archbishop Donoghue retires

Archbishop Donoghue, 76, has headed the Atlanta Archdiocese since 1993. Before his appointment, Archbishop Donoghue, who holds a canon law degree from The Catholic University of America, had been head of the Diocese of Charlotte for nine years, after serving as a priest in the Washington Archdiocese since his ordination on June 4, 1955.

Archbishop Gregory was president of the USCCB during a turbulent time for the U.S. church, as the bishops dealt with the clergy sexual abuse crisis. It was perhaps one of the most difficult periods in the conference's history.

Under his leadership, the bishops adopted a set of norms for handling accusations of abuse by priests and other church personnel; established a lay board to review how cases have been handled; commissioned an extensive analysis of the factors involved in the crisis; and created a staff office to oversee those efforts.

When he was first elected in 2001, much of the attention to Bishop Gregory focused on the fact that he was the first African-American to head the conference. One of nine active U.S. black bishops, he will be the third African-American to be named archbishop of Atlanta. His installation is scheduled for Jan. 17, which is Martin Luther King Jr. Day.

Archbishop Donoghue, a native of Washington, was named to head the Atlanta Archdiocese after Archbishop James P. Lyke died of cancer late in 1992, just 18 months after his installation.

Archbishop Donoghue made national news this summer when he and Bishops Peter J. Jugis and Robert J. Baker of Charleston, S.C., issued a joint letter saying Catholic politicians or candidates who support keeping abortion legal were barred from receiving Communion in any Catholic church in their dioceses.

The Aug. 4 letter said the ban can only be lifted after the politician's "public disavowal of former support for procured abortion" and "with the knowledge and consent of the local bishop."

Archbishop Donoghue has a long history of active involvement in fighting abortion, leading events in Atlanta on the anniversary of the Roe vs. Wade Supreme Court decision and participating in marches and rallies in Georgia, Washington and North Carolina.

While in Charlotte, he oversaw a massive expansion and reorganization of the diocese's school system and created its first diocesan newspaper, The Catholic News and Herald.

During Bishop Schmitt's tenure in West Virginia, he was among the first bishops to establish diocesan policies for dealing with sexual abuse accusations. His 1993 policy emphasized removing accused offenders from their positions, reporting accusations to civil authorities and providing counseling and other aid to victims.

He also launched an innovative vocations recruitment campaign using more than 160 billboards with slogans including "Good Guys Do Wear Black" and "Some White Collar Jobs Are More Challenging Than Others."

Archbishop Gregory is a native of Chicago, born Dec. 7, 1947. Though not raised as a Catholic, his parents enrolled him at St. Carthage Catholic School for the sixth grade. Within weeks he had decided he wanted to be a Catholic and by the end of the school year he had been baptized, made his first Communion and been confirmed.

He graduated from Quigley Preparatory Seminary South, Niles College of Loyola University and St. Mary of the Lake Seminary. After his ordination May 9, 1973, he obtained a doctorate in sacred liturgy from the Pontifical Liturgical Institute in Rome.

Then-Father Gregory served in the Archdiocese of Chicago in various positions before being named an auxiliary bishop there in 1983. He was installed as head of the Diocese of Belleville, Ill., next to the Archdiocese of St. Louis, on Feb. 10, 1994.

The Archdiocese of Atlanta includes 69 counties in the northern part of Georgia. It has about 371,000 Catholics in a total population of nearly 6 million.

Stand up — God's grace may be knocking at the door

The child was 2 years old when he lost his ability to walk. He had been walking since 11 months, but one day he began to wobble and fell down, unable to get up.

The child was diagnosed with Legg-Calve-Perthes Disease, which is, in simple terms, the unexplained interruption of blood to the head of the femur (thighbone). The result is degeneration and deformity of the thighbone area.

The wobble was probably the result of inflammation of the joint lining, resulting in a painful limp developed suddenly over a few hours. The only course of action was to establish a new blood supply to the affected areas. The child's legs were placed in metal braces with a rod to hold them apart and motionless while the damage repaired itself hopefully over the next 18 to 24 months.

Although much about the disease was unknown at the time, the doctors were optimistic because the child was diagnosed early; if treated early and correctly, 60-70 percent of children with the disease recover with no long-term disability. The only thing the parents and family could do was pray their only child would recover.

The boy remained in the braces for two years, unable to stand or walk. By 4 years of age, he still crawled around on the floor, dragging his metal-encased, useless legs behind him.

At Christmastime, he and his parents gathered with their family at the child's grandparents' apartment. Nine people enjoyed a feast prepared by the grandmother, who sat at the head of the table.

She had always been a religious woman, the grandmother; always active in her church, always saying countless prayers for her family, friends and fellow parishioners. She was sitting quietly, seemingly looking down at her plate, when there were three loud, distinct knocks at the front door.

Nobody seemed to hear them, except the child's mother. She glanced to her mother-in-law, who, still looking down, nodded in silent satisfaction. The child's mother was confused — no one else had reacted to the knocks — so she leaned across the table.

"I think there's someone at the door," the mother whispered.

The grandmother looked up. "No," she said softly. "I'll tell you about it later."

When the mother and grandmother were finally alone, the grandmother explained she had just finished a novena — a nine-day series of prayers — to St. Martin de Porres. The saint, the grandmother said, had just given her his response.

"Your son will be healed within six months," the grandmother said.

The mother wasn't sure what to think, but couldn't deny the knocks she had heard.

Within six months of the knocks on

Murray's Musings

EDITOR

the door, the child was out of his braces. He was not only standing on his own, but walking, running.

That Christmas miracle happened almost 30 years ago. That was my grandmother, my mother. I was the child.

My grandmother, Katherine Murray, died in 1987 while I was a teenager. They say she died peacefully, sitting upright in a chair while praying the rosary. The paramedics told my father they had never seen anyone so at peace.

Unfortunately I didn't learn about St. Martin de Porres' involvement in my condition until after my grandmother's death. The saint, born in Lima, Peru, in 1579, became a lay brother at the Dominican friary at Lima where he served, among other things, over the Dominican's infirmary and became known for his tender care of the sick and for his spectacular, often miraculous cures (including raising the dead).

Since moving to the South, I've heard many people scoff at the notion of "praying to saints" and intercessory prayers. One Baptist, who didn't know my story, told me Catholics wasted their time praying to dead saints who were "no better than anybody else."

Perhaps. And perhaps the metal braces clamped to my legs would have worked without St. Martin's intervention.

But two people heard those knocks on the door, and they believed. I don't really need any more convincing than that. But whenever I'm in doubt, all I have to do is stand up. The power of heaven always seems a little bit closer when I do.

It's a pity there are so many in this world who don't have faith, who don't know, or refuse to know, the effect a simple prayer can have, or the grace our Lord is willing to give. God does listen to our prayers. But do we always listen when he speaks to us?

We had better start listening — we don't want to miss the knocking at the door. You never know who it might be.

I don't run quite like I used to, but before I gather with my family this Christmas, I think I'll go for a quick sprint around the block. I know my grandmother will be smiling down as I dash about.

And while I'm out there, I think I'll have some grateful words for a certain Dominican saint and offer some prayers for the people I love.

COME, LET US ADORE HIM

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

May the grace and peace of Our Lord Jesus Christ be with you always.

Our Holy Father, Pope John Paul II, has proclaimed a "Year of the Eucharist" to be celebrated throughout the Church from October 2004 to October 2005. The theme he has chosen for our reflection during this year is "The Eucharist: the Source and Summit of the Life and Mission of the Church."

In his encyclical on the Eucharist last year, the Holy Father reminded us: "The Church draws her life from Christ in the Eucharist; by Him she is fed and by Him she is enlightened. ... Whenever the Church celebrates the Eucharist, the faithful can in some way relive the experience of the two disciples on the road to Emmaus: 'their eyes were opened and they recognized Him' (Lk 24:31)" (n. 6).

During this eucharistic year we are also asked to "open" our eyes to see Christ more clearly and lovingly, especially in the celebration of the Mass and in the worship of Christ's eucharistic presence outside Mass. In his Apostolic Letter inaugurating the Year of the Eucharist, the Holy Father wrote: "If the only result of this year were the revival in all Christian communities of the celebration of Sunday Mass and an increase in eucharistic worship outside Mass, this year of grace would be abundantly successful" ("Stay with us, Lord," n. 29).

On the level of the universal Church, the Year of the Eucharist began with the International Eucharistic Congress in Mexico in October 2004; it will include the World Youth Day in Cologne, Germany Aug. 16-21, 2005, with the theme, "We have come to worship him"; and it will end with the Synod of Bishops in Rome Oct. 2-29, 2005.

On the level of our diocesan Church, a Diocesan Eucharistic Congress is being planned for Friday, Sept. 23 and Saturday, Sept. 24, 2005 at the Charlotte Convention Center. This will be a time of celebration, adoration and catechesis centered on the mystery of the Eucharist. More information will be published in the coming months regarding this event, but I ask you to set those dates aside now and plan to be with us for this Eucharistic Congress.

A special holy card is also being prepared for the Year of the Eucharist and will soon be available. You will find the text of the prayer printed below. It contains a special petition to Our Lord for more vocations to the priesthood and to the religious life to serve Him in the Diocese of Charlotte, and a petition for His blessing on all our families throughout the diocese.

To celebrate this Year of the Eucharist, I ask that you give primary importance to your participation each Sunday in the celebration of Mass at your parish church. In addition, consider spending some time in eucharistic adoration outside of Mass. Many parishes have regularly scheduled times each month for eucharistic exposition and Benediction.

In three locations in our diocese, there are extended periods of Eucharistic Exposition during the daytime hours each day: at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville; at St. Barnabas Church in Arden; and at the Adoration Chapel at Belmont Abbey. In addition, eucharistic exposition is perpetually available at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte and at Maryfield Chapel in High Point. Would you consider becoming a regular adorer by committing to a scheduled hour each week at one of our adoration chapels?

The Holy Eucharist truly is the source and summit of the life and mission of the Church. As we intensify our love for the Eucharist this year, may the life of grace also increase in each of us. Please know that I remember you in my daily prayers.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis
Bishop of Charlotte

Prayer to Obtain Grace and Mercy
Year of the Eucharist 2004-2005

Lord Jesus Christ, during this Year of the Eucharist, may our worship and contemplation of the mystery of your Body and Blood obtain for us an abundance of grace and mercy.

May you, the High Priest of the New Covenant, raise up priests as ardent but gentle stewards of Your Mysteries to shepherd your faithful people. May you also inspire generous hearts to follow you, the Divine Shepherd, as religious sisters and brothers. Throughout our diocese strengthen our families with your grace.

May Mary, Mother of God and patroness of our Diocese, assist us during this year as we contemplate your face with her.

May we offer the sacrifice of our lives in union with your perfect sacrifice and so come to share in the eternal banquet, where you live with the Father and the Holy Spirit, one God forever and ever. Amen.

A judge's ruling

Dying man sees God's love in life

Listening to the radio while driving to work, my mind drifted back to the old Mecklenburg County courthouse in Charlotte. It was a noisy place in the 1980s. Wooden floors trod by the innocent and the guilty filled the place with a constant shuffling echo.

As a television reporter in those days, I spent a fair amount of time in the halls of justice. Since I was in the building a lot, I got to know the clerks, the judges, the district attorney and some of the assistant DAs. That's how I met Brent McKnight, a newly hired assistant DA in 1980. He was a quiet person with an impish intensity that made him look somewhat distracted at times.

I didn't get to know him well; he did not handle the high-profile cases that I covered. Eventually we both moved on — he became a federal magistrate and then a federal district court judge. It wasn't until I read his November obituary that I learned McKnight was both a Morehead and a Rhodes Scholar and, in addition to his legal training, he earned a degree in theology.

Brent McKnight was a renaissance man.

My musing in the car was interrupted by a commercial for Harrah's Cherokee Casino in the western part of North Carolina. The announcer was extolling the virtue of playing a game called "Set for Life." The names of regular gamblers are entered into a drawing and one of them wins $100,000 a year for "life," which the rules describe as a 20-year period. Click. I turn it off.

Life is short, but 20 years? By those standards, McKnight lived a long life, but in the real world, away from the clanging bells and neon of a casino, we know that his 52 years were far too short.

McKnight leaves two legacies. The first is a distinguished legal career. He presided over cases; he wrote, he taught, he advocated for justice. The second legacy is a letter he wrote on the last day of his life. Evangelist Leighton Ford read part of it at the funeral: "Know the world is a lot more complex than the views presented by TV, the pop scene and modern art. They reduce life and take the soul out of it."

I doubt a more succinct commentary on the role of the media in our lives has ever been written. McKnight probably never heard Harrah's "Set for Life" commercial but he was talking about it and the shallowness of the "get rich, look great, be happy" promise that the media constantly tells us is the holy grail of our existence.

The media has had this nation on sensory overload since the NBC peacock unfurled his brightly colored feathers in the 1960s. McKnight's reminder that the media doesn't have all of the answers is a refreshing thought in a land where we are inundated with messages of weight loss, Britney Spears and plasma TVs.

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

Fortunately, the McKnight letter didn't end with his thoughtful and biting criticism of the media. He continued: "Know the single most important thing is that this is not a dying world. God watches over us and it's alive."

What hope for the rest of us! A dying man, cheated out of what undoubtedly would have been a life of continued accomplishment and success, sees the handiwork of the Lord and tells us to rejoice in it. Published reports say that McKnight loved this world and didn't want to leave it. Yet his parting thought was that, thanks to the love of God, we remain in a glorious place.

I don't know who won the "Set for Life" drawing at the gambling casino, but I do know that before he left us, Brent McKnight was set for eternity.

KAREN EVANS
STAFF WRITER

It's the middle of December, and most of my Christmas shopping is done. (Thank you, online shopping.) Just one more niece to buy for, and if she doesn't give me some suggestions soon, she'll be receiving that book I threatened her with the last time I spoke to her.

So now that the family shopping is almost done, I can turn my attention to the other people in my life. Unfortunately, my Christmas money is diminished, and I spent my Christmas bonus buying "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy DVDs. So, here's what they are getting, since money is no object:

For my family: Wishes for love, health and happiness.

For my "sassy" friends: Hopes for health, financial stability and an absence of emotional turmoil for the next year. They've been through a lot this year, and they deserve some happiness.

For all my friends, new and old, near and far: The knowledge that I think of you often and you are always in my heart.

For my editor, Kevin: Punctuality and met deadlines. (This one is ironic, since I rolled into the office at 10 a.m. today and this column was due yesterday.)

For my readers: My thanks for appreciating my work this past year, and my apologies if you didn't. We may not always agree, but I hope that maybe I helped you see your neighbors with more compassion.

For soldiers at war: The hope that they treat each other and the "enemy" with compassion and fairness.

For political and religious leaders: The hope that they act in the best interest of those they serve.

For Christians throughout the world: The hope that they know why we celebrate Christmas, and the ability to try to live our lives in the spirit of Christ's love.

For all people — Christian, Muslim, Jewish, etc.; rich or poor; educated or not: My prayers that they openly receive God's love and grace.

For my lord, Jesus Christ: My sincere desire to always do your will.

For my niece, Caitlin: A book, unless you tell me soon what you want for Christmas (besides a Carolina Panthers jersey, since it's out of my price range and Grandma already bought it for you.)

The merriest of Christmases to all!

My Christmas wish for you

Gift of hope makes for better tomorrow

Sometimes I wish I never had studied history! For what a person learns is that history repeats itself when it comes to battles and war.

Right now the United States not only is fighting terrorism, but also a more terrifying war on corruption here and abroad. Without a doubt, if corruption could be stamped out, we wouldn't have war. Unfortunately, this story is repeatedly told in history, and we know how the story goes.

During my lifetime, the United States has fought World War II and the Korean, Vietnam, Afghanistan and Iraq wars, to say nothing of fighting other smaller wars. Even when wars are won, history appears to repeat itself with new battles.

In our personal lives, we forever are fighting inner battles. If we are honest with ourselves, we know that the inner peace and unity we desire never fully will be achieved in this world. But when taken too seriously, this reality of our personal history might easily lead us to despair and depression.

Despair is insidious. It whispers to us: "Forget your enthusiasm for a brighter future. What you see today will be repeated tomorrow. Nothing is new, and you have no control over history, which repeats itself."

Christmas is a time of hope. As the Hebrew nation looked forward to a Messiah, so are we Christians meant to be forward looking. But how is this forward-looking spirit cultivated?

Recently, the Catholic Church Extension Society, an organization dedicated to serving our home missions, sent me the final version of a video titled "The Invisible Church." It is the story of bishops, priests and lay leaders who are working with havens in the outposts of this country.

The video reminds us that the United States still is a mission country in need of missionary work. More important, it reminds us that there are countless heroic, caring people dedicated to serving the less fortunate. As grim as the circumstances in which these missionaries' work may be, they constantly bring hope to seemingly hopeless situations. They embody a spirit that always looks for ways to help people look forward to tomorrow and to plan ways to improve things.

Wherever we live — in a rural, suburban or urban setting — there is someone who either is helping us or helping someone around us to be forward looking and to see hope in the coming day.

This Christmas, it is my wish that you be especially blessed with the gift of hope. As hopeless as things sometimes may seem, may you never lose your desire to search for that something special that will cause you to look forward to tomorrow.

May you never lose your enthusiasm for devising new plans to improve your life.

May you never lose sight of those around you whose care forever is generating new hope.

May God bless you with a caring disposition that brings hope to others, and may you never lose your belief in the God of history, who ultimately controls it.

Have a very blessed Christmas filled with the hope of the Christ Child!

Charlotte Catholic captures state football championship

With five seconds remaining in the state 2AA championship football game, a desperation pass is tipped by Charlotte Catholic High School defenders before being caught by a Western Alamance High School receiver just short of the end zone. Charlotte Catholic won the game 14-7, the team's first state championship since 1977.

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — The Charlotte Catholic High School Cougars football team capped a perfect 16-0 season by capturing the North Carolina High School Athletic Association 2AA Championship with a thrilling 14-7 victory over Western Alamance High School at Duke University's Wallace Wade Stadium Dec. 11. The championship was the first for the Cougars and longtime coach Jim Oddo since 1977.

The game took place before thousands of students, alumni, family and friends who made the trip to Durham to support the team. It was the culmination of a magical season that saw the entire Charlotte Catholic community in Charlotte following the team through its regular season and run through the playoffs.

The Cougars were the champions of the Rocky River Conference after a perfect 11-0 regular season. They were led by senior running back Nick Starcevic, who set a school record rushing for 1,994 yards — the sixth highest total in Mecklenburg County history — and 30 touchdowns. The team also featured a stubborn defense that limited opponents to an average of 12 points per game.

Charlotte Catholic advanced through the early rounds of the state playoffs with victories over West Caldwell (35-6), Canton Pishgah (27-21) and Monroe (47-33) high schools. They then defeated Catawba Bandys by a 14-9 score to capture the 2AA Western Championship. That victory set up the meeting with the Western Alamance Warriors for the state championship.

When the Cougars arrived at the Duke campus on game day, they began their pre-game preparation as they always do, with Father John Allen, school chaplain and vocations director for the Diocese of Charlotte, celebrating Mass. The only difference was that they were in historic Duke Chapel instead of Charlotte Catholic's new chapel.

Facing their toughest opponent of the season, Charlotte Catholic opened the scoring with a touchdown run by Starcevic late in the first quarter. Western Alamance tied the game with a scoring pass with 42 seconds remaining in the half. The score remained knotted up through most of the second half, as both team's defenses played rugged, physical football.

With less than four remaining in the game, the Cougars got the ball at their own 22-yard line. In spite of their previous difficulty moving the ball against the Western Alamance defense, Charlotte Catholic pounded away yard by yard and inch by inch. The key play was a 22-yard screen pass from quarterback Craig Warnement to Starcevic, which put the Cougars deep in Western Alamance's territory.

In this final drive, Charlotte Catholic marched 78 yards in nine plays and finally took the lead on a 2-yard run by Starcevic with exactly one minute left in the game.

The game wasn't over, however, as Western Alamance was able to move the ball to the Charlotte Catholic 25-yard line with five seconds remaining. A desperation pass was tipped by several Charlotte Catholic defenders before being caught by a Western Alamance receiver just short of the end zone as time ran out.

The Charlotte Catholic players rushed the field to celebrate the victory. Running back Brett Bauer, defensive tackle Tyler Bullard and Starcevic earned awards as the game's best offensive player, defensive player and most valuable player, respectively.

Clergy sex abuse fallout, debate on Catholics in politics earn top stories

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — According to Catholic News Service, for the third straight year the fallout from the Catholic clergy sexual abuse of minors was one of the biggest ongoing religious news stories in the United States, followed closely in Catholic circles by a debate over the relationship between church teachings and the political responsibilities of Catholics.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the topic that garnered the most attention was

Sister Peter Claver Fahy, who worked in prison ministry in Philadelphia until age 99, is seen in this undated photo. Sister Fahy died Dec. 3 at the age of 105 in Philadelphia. She began her prison ministry in Philadelphia at age 80 after a half-century of service as a nun.

Nun who persevered in prison ministry until age 99 dies at 105

PHILADELPHIA (CNS) — When Trinitarian Sister Peter Claver Fahy came to Philadelphia at the age of 80 to begin a ministry of prayer in her official "retirement," she immediately set to work in some of the toughest prisons in the region.

She led prayer and Bible readings in her ministry to incarcerated men and wrote letters to judges on their behalf until she could no longer hobble down the long prison halls at age 99.

Loved and respected by wealthy businessmen and prison inmates alike, Sister Peter Claver died Dec. 3 at the age of 105 at the motherhouse of her order, the Missionary Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity, in Philadelphia.

"She had a profound impact. She was an extremely zealous missionary, and she was able to think outside the box," said Sister Barbara deMondeville, historian for the Trinitarian sisters.

"All her life she found creative ways to work with the poor and to work with prisoners," said Sister deMondeville. "She established houses of hospitality for women in crisis long before that was the thing to do."

Born in Rome, Ga., as Hannah Elizabeth Fahy, she entered the Missionary Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity in 1926, then a young congregation founded in Alabama that specialized in missionary work and outreach among the poor. She took the name Sister Peter Claver of the Most Precious Blood, honoring her special apostolate to African-Americans and her love of Christ.

Over the next half-century, Sister Peter Claver served as a teacher, principal, librarian, director of social services, director of a house of prayer, and diocesan director of religious education.

In 1933, she met Dorothy Day, a convert and a founder of the Catholic Worker movement whose cause for canonization is now under consideration. The two women had in common Catholic orthodoxy, coupled with an uncompromising championship for those on society's margins.

The two women remained lifelong friends, and Sister Peter Claver was one of the last people to visit Day before the activist's death in 1980. Day said it was Sister Peter Claver who introduced her to spiritual retreats and made her Catholic life complete.

Sister Peter Claver's funeral Mass was celebrated Dec. 7 at the Most Blessed Trinity motherhouse.

Former Iraq administrator honored for service to United States, Iraq

INDIANAPOLIS (CNS) — One day after receiving the Presidential Medal of Freedom from President Bush at the White House Dec. 14, L. Paul Bremer III, former administrator in Iraq, was honored by Civitas Dei, a Catholic business association, in Indianapolis for courageous leadership and service to the United States.

Bremer received the Thomas E. Burnett Jr. Heroic Leadership Award, named in honor of Burnett who helped fight terrorists on board hijacked United Airlines Flight 93 on Sept. 11, 2001, forcing the plane to crash in Pennsylvania instead of into the White House, which officials believed was the intended target.

Bremer, a Catholic, served as the presidential envoy to Iraq and administrator of the coalition provisional authority there from May 6, 2003, to June 28, 2004.

There is a "true struggle ... between good and evil" in Iraq, said Bremer.

"There really are evil men out there who want to kill us, and kill us by the thousands."

"These are people who hate the West for what we are, and they hate everything about us ... the very foundations of Western society, the separation of church and state, universal suffrage, women's education, democratic freedoms, political parties, a free press," he said.

In the war against terrorism, he said, "there are no compromises with these people. There's no deal to be made with them. They simply have to be confronted and defeated" because they represent a significant threat to American security.

"We are going to be called upon to be tough-minded and to defeat these evil men," Bremer said. "This, by the way, is not a new role for the Catholic Church. For centuries, Catholicism, I believe, has played an important role in this titanic struggle for freedom and democracy."

FROM THE VATICAN

Hopelessness brews in Sudan as Darfur violence continues, report says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Hatred and hopelessness are brewing in Darfur as unrelenting violence still enflames western Sudan, according to Caritas Internationalis.

"Darfur is a tinderbox of war, dread and very little hope," according to a Dec. 20 report by Caritas, the Vatican-based global confederation of Catholic social service and development organizations.

"Reports of armed clashes throughout the region continue to mount, fueling concerns that whatever humanitarian progress has been made faced new threats and potential obstacles," the report said.

Caritas Internationalis has joined forces with Action by Churches Together International in its emergency response to the humanitarian crisis in Darfur.

In a joint, ecumenical appeal, Caritas is working to provide shelter, water, sanitation and cooking materials to 500,000 displaced people in southern and western Darfur.

At least 1.2 million people have been forced to flee their homes in the almost two years of fighting among rebels, the Sudanese army and Arab militia groups. Hundreds of thousands of people are living in overcrowded camps in Sudan and neighboring Chad.

Reporting on conditions in a camp near the city of Garsilla, in western Darfur, Caritas said violence continues to haunt refugees, especially women who risk sexual assault and violence by roaming militias. Rape is "a problem on a daily basis," a humanitarian worker told Caritas.

Human rights groups claim Arab militia backed by the Sudanese government are waging a terror campaign against black Africans in order to push them from their lands in Darfur.

Desire for children cannot justify destroying embryos, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The legitimate desire for children or the hope for a cure for a disease can never excuse the immoral destruction of human life in the destruction of human embryos, Pope John Paul II said.

Human life is to be "accepted with love and in love" from the moment of its conception, the pope told members of the Italian Forum of Family Associations during a Dec. 18 audience at the Vatican.

Artificial fertilization techniques that include the destruction of some fertilized embryos and the use of embryos to harvest stem cells in the hope of curing disease are examples of "desires taking the place of an authentic right," the right to life, the pope said.

"The legitimate desire for a child or for health cannot be transformed into an unconditional right to the point of justifying the suppression of other human rights," the pope said.

"Science and technology are truly at the service of humanity only if they safeguard ... all the human subjects involved in the generative process," he said.

Pope John Paul encouraged Catholic family groups to be more active in defending human life and the family in the field of politics.

"Unfortunately, attacks on marriage and the family are stronger and more radical today both on an ideological front as well as in the area of law," he said.

The pope encouraged members of the forum to help people understand that the family cannot be reduced "to a private, socially irrelevant experience of affection," because the permanent union of a man and a woman and their bringing children into the world is the foundation of society.

"The one who destroys this basic fabric of human coexistence deeply wounds society and provokes damage that often is irreparable," he said.

Music and history

The Mariachi Los Viajeros Band provides music for the Our Lady of Guadalupe celebration for students, faculty, staff and parents at Our Lady of the Assumption School Dec. 13. The event began with a prayer service, followed by music, dancing and a cast of fifth-graders portraying the story of Juan Diego's encounter with Mary, who appeared as an Aztec princess near Mexico City in 1531.

POPE CREATES NEW TEXAS ARCHDIOCESE, TRANSFERS THREE BISHOPS

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope John Paul II has elevated the Diocese of Galveston-Houston to an archdiocese, appointed three bishops to new posts and accepted the resignation of Archbishop Patrick F. Flores of San Antonio.

The announcements were made Dec. 29 in Washington by Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

The bishops receiving new posts are:

— Auxiliary Bishop Jose H. Gomez of Denver, who was named to replace Archbishop Flores in San Antonio.

— Bishop Robert J. Carlson of Sioux

Falls, S.D., who was named to head the Diocese of Saginaw, Mich., replacing Bishop Kenneth E. Untener, who died March 27.

— Auxiliary Bishop Jerome E. Listeki of Chicago who was named head of the Diocese of La Crosse, Wis., left vacant in December 2003 when its leader was named to head the Archdiocese of St. Louis.

With the elevation of Galveston-Houston to an archdiocese, Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza becomes an archbishop and Bishop Daniel N. DiNardo, named coadjutor bishop of Galveston-Houston last January, becomes coadjutor archbishop.

Southern bishops call for more criminal justice

Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas and Texas signed the letter, which they issued as members of the Bishops' Advisory Committee of the Kentucky-based Catholic Committee of the South.

"We must recognize the human dignity of all prisoners and remember that Jesus himself was a prisoner," said the letter, released in mid-December during the Advent season.

The letter quoted from the national statement on crime and criminal justice adopted by the U.S. bishops in November 2000: "We believe the current trend of more and more people in prisons, with little education and drug treatment, does not reflect Christian values and will not make our communities safer."

Saying that protecting society and rehabilitating criminals "calls for a focus on rehabilitation and restoration," the Southern bishops said such an approach has significant policy implications for correctional justice systems.

At the top of the list, they said, "We must stop the practice of putting so many people in prison. ... Our imprisonment rate is the highest in the world — six to 12 times higher than rates in other Western countries. The United States now spends more than $50 billion per year on jails and prisons."

Resources being used to build more prisons would be better spent on "crime prevention, rehabilitation of prisoners, education, substance abuse (treatment) and programs of probation, parole and re-integration," they said.

Citing the transforming effect of faith on people's lives, the bishops said, "Genuine religious participation contributes to rehabilitation and renewal. Therefore, all jails, prisons or detention facilities should have a regular and ongoing Catholic ministry."

"Prisoners are entitled to be safe" from abuse or violence by prison gangs, other inmates or guards, they said.

They also called for an end to "racism and discrimination" in criminal justice, citing the higher imprisonment rates of blacks and Hispanics than of whites.

Citing the correlation between drug abuse and crime, they said, "All prisoners deserve the opportunity to participate in substance abuse programs. ... Providing drug treatment will save more than it will cost in the long run."

"Many in our prison system would do better in settings more equipped to handle their mental health needs," they said.

The bishops called for more community assistance for families of those in prison, including preparing them for the steps needed to reintegrate prisoners into society following their release.

"We call for national standards to be adopted and enforced regarding pay for prisoners," they said. "Enabling prisoners to work for a fair wage may, among other things, help keep their families off welfare, either totally or partially."

The bishops of the South began the series of pastoral letters on aspects of the criminal justice system in December 2002, releasing a new one each Advent and Lent, as a follow-up to the bishops' national statement in 2000.

The first letter focused on challenges for the criminal justice process in the South, where incarceration rates are the highest in the country.

The second letter criticized the growing privatization of U.S. prisons, the third focused on juvenile justice and the fourth dealt with restorative justice and alternatives to prison.

The next letter will discuss post-release issues and the one after that will be on women in prison, she said.

'We were a perfect match for the project.'

enliven the stark worship spaces normally used by troops overseas.

The system allowed more than 100 images of stained-glass windows to be projected onto the wall of tents, hangars, ship's chapels — virtually any facility in which troops celebrated Christmas services.

"With Neil's great images and technical know-how and my field experience and connections, we were a perfect match for the project," said Father Butler.

"The idea for the visual presentation was entirely Father Butler's," said Ralley, speaking via telephone from his home in Verona, N.J. "He was certainly the one with the vision of what this project was to be."

Father Butler said those at Manas Air Base, a strategic hub for U.S. military personnel and equipment flowing in and out of Afghanistan in support of Operation Enduring Freedom, live and work in tents.

"Everything in our camp is tan and gray," he said.

As the Christmas season approached, the chaplain began to "think of a way to create a sense of sacred space" inside these "relatively bare" tents used for worship.

"Stained-glass windows are so colorful and ethereal. I figured these might work well," he said.

Working with little more than a digital video projector normally used to show recreational movies, he began to search the Internet for usable images of stained-glass windows. He stumbled across Ralley's Web site, www.stainedglassphotography.com.

"Of all the Web sites I came across, (Ralley's) had the best selection and quality of images," said Father Butler.

He first downloaded one image as a trial. Impressed by the beauty of the image, but not wanting to infringe on any copyrights, he contacted Ralley and asked to use the pictures in creating a slide show of the stained-glass windows to "set a mood" for troops entering Christmas midnight Mass.

Father Butler hoped he might also be able to use a single image as a continuously projected background throughout the Mass.

Ralley not only gave permission for Father Butler to use any of the images on his Web site, he offered to create the slide show himself.

"He said it would be an honor to help make the Christmas liturgies more special for our troops over here," the chaplain said.

Father Butler began to realize many other chaplains throughout Iraq and Afghanistan might wish to use the stained-glass images. He said digital projectors such as the one he used are provided to chaplains assigned to bases and posts — whether in tents or more permanent facilities — as well as ships.

Consequently, Ralley posted a slide-show program containing the images on a limited-access section of his Web site for military chaplains anywhere in the world to download. For his part, Father Butler has spread access information to numerous chaplains throughout the Afghan and Iraqi theaters of operations.

Ralley hoped the show, which lasts approximately a half-hour, "will brighten up the otherwise Spartan places of worship for our soldiers, Marines, sailors and airmen during Christmas services."

YEAR OF THE EUCHARIST

New section devoted to the Eucharist

Welcome to a new section of The Catholic News & Herald devoted to the Eucharist.

Pope John Paul II recently proclaimed October 2004 through October 2005 as the Year of the Eucharist, and this month Bishop Peter J. Jugis announced that the Diocese of Charlotte is hosting a Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte this coming September 2005.

This historic event, a first for the Diocese of Charlotte, will be a wonderful celebration of engaging speakers, heartfelt prayer and exultant rejoicing. More information on the Eucharistic Congress is available online at www.goeucharist.com.

To coincide with these events, this section will be an ongoing devotion to and exploration of the Eucharist, with stories, columns and other information relating to the Eucharist, eucharistic adoration, the Eucharistic Congress and the Year of the Eucharist.

Eucharistic adoration is offered at the following churches:

- Andrews — Holy Redeemer Church — Fridays, 9-10 a.m., with confessions ending with Benediction
- Arden — St. Barnabas Church — Saturdays, 6 a.m.-4 p.m.; Sundays, 1-10 p.m.; weekdays, 6 a.m.-10 p.m.

Dignum et iustum Est
Understanding the Mystery of the Mass

Pope John Paul II recently designated Oct. 17, 2004 to Oct. 29, 2005 as the Year of the Eucharist. During this year, we have the wonderful privilege to commemorate and devote ourselves more faithfully to our Lord, who is truly present in the holy Eucharist.

During this year designated to the sacrament of our Lord's body and blood, we would benefit greatly to contemplate the tremendous mystery of the holy sacrifice of the Mass and the gift of the holy Eucharist. In doing so, we are not about to explain away the mystery that has physically, spiritually and intellectually nourished the Catholic Church for 2,000 years. Our task is to discover, or rather rediscover, the fruits of our redemption purchased by the sacrifice of Jesus Christ on our behalf.

We are going to spend the better part of this year devoted to the holy Eucharist to penetrate more deeply into the mystery of the Mass and the sacrament of the altar in our weekly catechism lessons. And so, our discussion this week begins with the end.

What is the purpose of the Mass? Why do we go to Mass?

Let us answer the latter first. We go to Mass because God obliges us, commands us and even demands our presence at Mass each week. Recall that for thousands of years, ever since God led the Israelites, his people, from slavery in Egypt to the Promised Land, he has commanded his chosen people to "keep holy the Sabbath."

For the Jews, this meant the strict observance of rest from labor in order to be refreshed. Man is to imitate God his creator who rested from the six days of work on the seventh day. And on this Sabbath day, man is to recall the goodness of God in delivering his people from slavery, to remember God's covenant with his people and to praise, worship and adore God.

For Christians, we recall the fulfillment of God's saving work in Jesus Christ, who releases man from the spiritual bondage of sin and death. Man is still obliged by God to "keep holy the Sabbath" even though the Sabbath for Christians is not marked on Saturday, the seventh day, but Sunday, which is the first day of the new creation, the eighth day.

So essential is keeping "holy the Sabbath day" that the first precept of the church is to "attend Mass on Sundays and holy days of obligation." Failure to do so without a good mitigating reason is considered mortal sin and can separate us from God.

So why does God oblige us to attend Mass? Ultimately, there are two reasons.

Guest Column

FATHER
MATTHEW BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

First, dignum et iustum est. "It is right to give thanks and praise." The Mass teaches us the ultimate reason for attending Mass is that God deserves it. All that we are and all that we have been given is a pure gift from God. We cannot earn his love; we cannot merit his grace; we cannot purchase life without end. All is a divine gift.

Therefore, we are in debt to God. And since God creates us for himself, to honor him, to adore him and to serve him alone, we are bound by the duty of justice to offer him the greatest sacrifice of praise that is humanly possible. Justice demands that God, who is perfect, receive a perfect sacrifice of praise. But man, estranged from God since the sin of Adam and Eve, is essentially incapable of offering a perfect sacrifice. That is, until God became man and offered himself on our behalf. And this brings us to the second ultimate reason for attending Mass.

We not only render to God the praise he is due at Mass, but we do so principally through Jesus Christ, the high priest. At Mass, we unite ourselves with the worship of the Son unto the Father in the Holy Spirit. By recalling the events of Christ's passion, death and resurrection, and through a supernatural miracle at every Mass, we are truly present at Calvary, present when Christ offered the one perfect sacrifice of his body and blood to the Father and offered the fruits of his sacrifice to you and me.

Christ's sacrifice is the perfect expression of divine justice and divine mercy. And in recalling these same events day after day, week after week, year after year, we approach our goal, which is salvation.

And so, God commands us to "keep holy the Sabbath" and obliges us to attend Mass in order to worship him through the perfect worship of his own son so that we may receive the sacramental gift of our redemption, the Body and Blood of Christ.

Next week, we will examine how to prepare ourselves for the holy sacrifice of the Mass.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Shrine becomes morgue for victims

by an undersea seismic disturbance — struck southern coastal areas.

A massive earthquake off the coast of Indonesia's Sumatra Island generated tsunamis with waves up to 33 feet high that caused massive devastation on islands and coastlines of 12 countries in South and Southeast Asia.

As of Dec. 29, the combined death toll had passed 77,000, and may surpass 100,000. Indonesia had the highest reported number of casualties, more than 45,000; with Sri Lanka second at 23,000. In India, at least 12,500 deaths. The tolls were expected to rise.

"Our shrine has become a graveyard," said Father Xavier, the shrine rector, as he led groups of volunteers.

Huge waves struck when Father Xavier was overseeing Mass celebrations Dec. 26. Thousands of people had been at the shrine; spending Christmas there is a custom among many Christians in Tamil Nadu and neighboring states.

"We do not know the number of pilgrims who have died in this disaster, but we have collected about 300 bodies so far," Father Xavier said.

The waves destroyed the compound wall but spared the shrine, which is on higher ground. Most victims were on the adjacent beach after the first Sunday morning Mass.

The waves struck about 9:20 a.m. Those on the seashore scurried for cover, but the massive waves dragged most of them away. The waves receded almost at the same speed they came, sucking hundreds of people into the churning sea.

Father Xavier said that as he rushed out of the shrine, he saw water everywhere and bodies on the beach.

The priest said that after he overcame his shock and fear, he asked parish lay leaders to launch a rescue mission. The assault by the sea had snapped telephone and electricity lines, so the parish sent someone to the diocesan headquarters to seek aid.

Villages around the Vailankanni shrine witnessed heart-rending scenes as rescue teams pulled out body after body. An estimated 3,000 people have perished in the 28-mile stretch of coast

"Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion." The joint statement, issued in August by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and then-Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston, S.C., stated Catholic politicians or candidates who persistently support abortion may not be admitted to holy Communion in their dioceses.

"We received hundreds of e-mails and letters in response to the pastoral statement," said David Hains, director of communications for the Diocese of Charlotte. "The majority were in support."

Bishop Jugis said he received numerous personal expressions of support from lay people and clergy across the diocese where he had attended Masses, meetings or other gatherings since the statement's release.

Despite the controversy, Bishop Jugis was grateful to have such wide-ranging discussions on abortion and church teaching.

"Procured abortion is always intrinsically evil and can never be justified. It is a direct attack on an innocent human life," said Bishop Jugis. "The pope wrote in the encyclical on the Gospel of Life in 1995 that today many people have lost a sense of how grave abortion is."

"Because it is accepted in the popular mind, in behavior and in the law, people are losing the ability to distinguish between good and evil, even on so fundamental an issue as the right to life of the unborn," he said.

Faithful citizenship

Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, who supports abortion, was the first Catholic presidential candidate to appear on a major-party ticket in 44 years.

Conflict between church teachings on abortion and human embryonic stem-cell research and Kerry's political positions on these matters led to major debate in Catholic circles over the political responsibilities of Catholics. Political analysts and media pundits devoted unprecedented energy to analyzing what difference the Catholic vote might make in 2004.

The most divisive discussion centered on whether Catholic public officials who hold political positions in conflict with fundamental church teachings should be allowed to receive Communion, and Bishops Jugis and Baker and Archbishop Donoghue weren't the only Catholic leaders to weigh in on the issue.

The issue first turned into a national debate in January when Archbishop Raymond L. Burke of St. Louis told reporters he would give Kerry a blessing, not the Eucharist, if Kerry approached him for Communion while campaigning in his archdiocese.

In the months that followed, a number of other bishops weighed in, some suggesting Communion should be denied to dissenting Catholic politicians and others saying they considered it pastorally inappropriate to use the Eucharist as a weapon in such circumstances.

In a pastoral letter in May Bishop Michael J. Sheridan of Colorado Springs, Colo., said not only are politicians out of communion with the church if they support abortion, illicit stem-cell research and euthanasia, but those who vote for such politicians also place themselves outside the church. Neither should receive Communion until they recant their positions and go to confession, he said.

In a statement issued at their June assembly, the U.S. bishops declared that politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good."

They said all Catholics are required to examine their conscience on their worthiness to receive Communion, but added that a canonical decision to deny Communion to anyone rests with each bishop in his own diocese because of "the wide range of circumstances involved in arriving at a prudential judgment" in each case.

The Catholic vote

Just nine days before the election, Kerry belatedly sought to address the controversy over how his Catholic faith relates to his values and public policy stands.

In a campaign speech in Florida he said his faith gave him "values to live by and apply to the decisions I make."

He noted that the bishops "have suggested that as a public official I must cast votes or take public positions — on issues like a woman's right to choose and stem-cell research — that carry out the tenets of the Catholic Church." He said his response is, "I love my church; I respect the bishops; but I respectfully disagree."

The Bush campaign's Web site had a special section addressed to Catholics, prominently featuring photos of the president's meeting last summer with the pope. The campaign sought membership lists of Catholic parishes and Protestant congregations to use in the campaign — a practice that brought objections from religious leaders.

The Bush strategy of focusing on weekly churchgoers succeeded. According to exit polls, Kerry won a majority of the votes among Catholics and Protestants who do not attend church regularly, but the Bush majority among weekly churchgoers, both Catholic and Protestant, gave him the winning margin in the election.

Many political commentators were surprised that the exit polls showed 22 percent of Americans ranking "moral values" as the issue that mattered the most — ahead of terrorism, the economy, Iraq, taxes, health care or education. Those who cited moral values as their chief concern voted for Bush by better than a 4-1 margin.

Although the exit polls did not seek to specify the moral values voters were concerned about, three of concern to the church were abortion, embryonic stem-cell research and same-sex marriage.

Pro-life issues

Abortion Ban Act as federal judges in New York, Nebraska and California declared the law unconstitutional.

But they won a victory in November when Congress adopted an omnibus appropriations bill containing the Hyde-Weldon Conscience Protection Amendment. That provision protects the right of hospitals, health plans and other providers of medical care to decline to provide, pay for or refer for abortions.

In October, the U.S. bishops launched a national ad campaign, "Let's find cures we can all live with," pointing out that results of adult human stem-cell research are already helping people with Parkinson's disease and heart and nerve diseases, while embryonic stem-cell research has not resulted in any therapeutic uses. The church opposes embryonic research because it entails the destruction of human embryos.

At the international level, the United Nations abandoned an effort to develop a global convention on human cloning. It could reach a consensus on banning reproductive cloning, but member nations were too divided on whether the ban should also apply to the cloning of human embryos that would be destroyed for research or therapeutic uses.

Same-sex marriage

There were referendums in 11 states Nov. 2 and in two other states earlier in the year to add language to state constitutions that would explicitly define marriage as a union of a man and a woman. Voters approved all 13 referendums, by margins ranging from 56 percent in Oregon to 86 percent in Mississippi.

The flurry of activity to add constitutional protection to laws against same-sex marriages came in reaction to a 2003 decision by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts declaring it unconstitutional to bar same-sex couples from marrying. The court delayed the effectiveness of its decision until May 17, 2004, giving the Legislature six months to adopt the necessary conforming legislation.

On May 17 several hundred same-sex couples obtained marriage licenses across the state.

The state's bishops led an intense campaign for a state constitutional amendment that would overturn the court ruling and uphold the traditional definition of marriage. They also sought to bar legalization of civil unions.

They got a partial victory as the Legislature gave first-round approval of an amendment that would bar same-sex marriages but legalize same-sex civil unions. The proposed amendment still needs a second legislative approval before it goes to the citizenry for a vote.

The legalization of gay and lesbian marriages in Massachusetts sparked gay rights activists across the country to new efforts for similar victories in their state courts and legislatures. Illegal same-sex marriages were performed in several parts of the country, most notably in San Francisco, where the city granted marriage licenses to same-sex couples for a month before the California Supreme Court ordered it to stop.

The U.S. bishops backed a federal constitutional amendment to uphold the traditional definition of marriage and Bush declared his support for such an amendment.

In November, describing the weakening of marriage as a major social, cultural and church problem, the U.S. bishops approved a project to write a national pastoral letter on marriage that will serve as a focal point for a multifaceted pastoral plan to strengthen and support marriage.

Clergy sex abuse crisis

The U.S. clergy sexual abuse crisis erupted in January 2002 with the revelations in Boston of the church's light treatment of abuse allegations and mishandling of priests accused of molesting minors. As the church entered the third year of the scandal in 2004, it was still dealing with the many ramifications of the harm done to children over several decades.

In January, the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection and National Review Board published the results of the first sex abuse and child protection compliance audits in 191 dioceses across the country. The report, given heavy media coverage nationwide, assessed the quality and effectiveness of every diocese's policies and programs and listed more than 50 specific recommendations on ways all dioceses could improve their child protection and sexual abuse responses in the future.

At the end of February, two major independent studies, commissioned by the bishops to help them and others understand the abuse crisis, were released simultaneously.

"A Report on the Crisis in the Catholic Church in the United States" was prepared by the all-lay National Review Board that the bishops formed in 2002 to help them address the abuse crisis. The report was highly critical of a clerical culture that did not recognize the seriousness of child abuse and of the way many bishops in the past handled abuse allegations and the accused priests.

The board's study and report were only a first step that set the groundwork for a more comprehensive academic study on the issue, which is still to be conducted.

The second released study, "The Nature and Scope of Sexual Abuse of Minors by Catholic Priests and Deacons in the United States 1950-2002," was prepared by New York's John Jay College of Criminal Justice, using data provided from diocesan files across the nation.

It reported that a total of 4,392 priests, or 4 percent of those active during that period, had been accused of sexual abuse of children. It said 10,667 individuals claimed to have been abused during that period.

In the two years since the end point of that study, additional allegations have been made — most concerning abuse that occurred decades ago and most naming priests who were already named by other victims — but national statistics on those subsequent claims have not yet been compiled.

Among numerous financial settlements between dioceses and abuse victims that were reached in 2004, several were settlements with a number of victims that went into millions of dollars. The number of claims and amount of compensation sought forced three dioceses to take the unprecedented step of a church body filing for bankruptcy protection under Chapter 11 of the federal Bankruptcy Act.

The Holy Father

As he entered the 26th year of his papacy, Pope John Paul II's health continued to decline and his lack of mobility and growing difficulty in speaking became increasingly evident.

Yet he traveled to Switzerland and France, met with world leaders including Bush, presided over several canonization and beatification ceremonies and met with each contingent of U.S. bishops during the course of the year as the heads of dioceses, including Bishop Jugis, traveled to Rome in regional groups to make their official five-year "ad limina" reports on their dioceses.

In October, he launched a worldwide Year of the Eucharist to promote understanding of and devotion to the Eucharist in preparation for the October 2005 Synod of Bishops on that subject. To coincide, the Diocese of Charlotte has planned a series of events leading up to a Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Sept. 23-24, 2005.

Broadening horizons

At their November meeting, the U.S. bishops approved the first "U.S. Catholic Catechism for Adults," approved Spanish-language liturgical texts for use in the United States for the celebrations of marriage, infant baptism and the "quinceanera," the customary celebration in many Hispanic cultures to mark a girl's 15th birthday.

The bishops also approved the USCCB becoming a founding member of a new national ecumenical body, Christian Churches Together in the USA. The organization is intended to bring together church leaders of the Catholic, Orthodox, historical Protestant, historical racial and ethnic, and evangelical and Pentecostal traditions, promoting greater mutual understanding and common prayer and Christian witness. It is to hold its first assembly in 2005.

The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission completed its work on a common statement, "Mary, Grace and Hope in Christ." It must be approved for publication by the appropriate authorities in each church before it will be released.

Book explains basics to Catholics 'Surprised by Canon Law'

BY JOE KOHN

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DETROIT — Michael Trueman is a lawyer — but he'll be the first to tell you that he doesn't fit the stereotypical mold.

He doesn't drive a BMW. He doesn't wear Armani suits. And his life is nothing like a scene from "Law & Order."

It has everything to do with his specialty: Trueman is a canon lawyer for the Archdiocese of Detroit. And — just as he's not a typical lawyer — church law is a far cry from civil law.

That's why he co-wrote "Surprised by Canon Law: 150 Questions Laypeople Ask About Canon Law," a question-and-answer book designed to help Catholics understand the basics of church law — which in its raw form entails encyclopedic volumes written in heavy-duty church language.

"Christ enlivens the church with his presence," he said.

As an ecclesiastical judge, he makes recommendations and decisions on various matters of church law for Catholics in the archdiocese.

"By way of analogy, canon law provides the backbone for that presence," said Trueman. "It helps the church accomplish its mission by giving it good order and structure."

What does the average Catholic know about the church's legal system?

"The question to ask is, 'Does your average lay Catholic know that there is a Code of Canon Law?'" Trueman said. "And the answer would have to be 'no' — they don't know that there is a codified legal system that is running in the background of the church's day-to-day life."

The book — which Trueman co-wrote with Pete Vere, a former classmate and fellow canonist from St. Paul University in Ottawa — lays out the basics of church law. In simple language, it answers questions about the sacraments, church structure, the duties of Catholics and parishioners' rights.

"This was not rocket science," Trueman said. "We took license to make things simple."

Here are some of the questions:

— Why do we have a pope and what is the scope of his authority?

— What can I expect from my pastor?

— May a layperson give a homily?

— What is required of a godparent?

"It's a very helpful introduction," said Father Robert McClory, who is a canonist and chancellor of the Archdiocese of Detroit, and who gave approval for the printing of the book.

"It opens people up to the wide range of issues that canon law addresses and it shows how it applies to their ongoing lives as Catholics," he said. "Catholics are naturally curious about the laws of the church, and it's helpful to have a guide that gives practical answers to questions rooted in our theology."

Apparently, lay Catholics across the country agree. Servant Books, recently acquired by St. Anthony Messenger Press, printed 5,000 copies of the book. Though the publisher will not say how many have been sold, Trueman said the book has been exceeding sales expectations.

"It's just exciting to know that people are interested in canon law," he said. "It has some importance in the lives of Catholics."

Trueman said he hopes his work can draw more people to a deeper interest in canon law. The church is in need of canon lawyers — a role traditionally held by priests that is now more frequently being filled by lay ministers.

Trueman also can speak about the effect canon law has had on his own life. He became interested in canon law while working at a parish in the Archdiocese of Halifax, Nova Scotia, on Canada's east coast.

He said he felt called to a lay vocation, but realized that working at a parish would be difficult while raising a family. He had received his first taste of canon law while working with the archdiocesan tribunal in Halifax.

"I was wanting to secure for myself a future of employment and vocation in the church as a layperson," he said. "Canon law allowed me to do that."

WORD TO LIFE

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: JAN. 9, 2005

Jan. 9, Baptism of the Lord

Cycle A Readings:

- 1) Isaiah 42:1-4, 6-7
Psalm 29:1-4, 9-10
- 2) Acts 10:34-38
- 3) Gospel: Matthew 3:13-17

Some moments speak for themselves

BY JEFF HENSLEY

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When we write our reflections for "Word to Life," it's always our aim to tell an anecdote or a personal story to show God's word in action. But sometimes the readings only lend themselves to reflection on the words themselves, as they reveal something of God's nature.

This week's readings start with the Psalms showing forth the glory and the power of God, his sheer "otherness," the grandeur that sets him apart from our experience and causes us to bend the knee to his magnificence.

The Isaiah reading brings us to the promise of a Messiah, a humble one, "upon whom I have put my spirit," as Isaiah has God saying it. This one will establish "justice on the earth; the coastlands will wait for his teaching."

Deeper and more deeply, this unknowable God, this majestic and awe-inspiring God enters into human affairs until, finally, Jesus his Son submits himself to baptism by John the Baptizer, who is extraordinarily puzzled and protests: "I should be baptized by you, yet you come to me."

And Jesus answers him that it is necessary to "fulfill all of God's commands."

When he has been baptized, Jesus comes "directly out of the water." Suddenly the sky opens and he sees the Spirit of God descend like a dove and hover over him. With that a voice from the heavens says: "This is my beloved Son. My favor rests on him."

The unknowable and unreachable has chosen to lower himself in his Son to receive a blessing, a baptism at the hands of one of his creatures. It is a moment beyond our comprehension and our ability to comment. It is a truly awe-inspiring moment. It is the incarnation. It is the coming of the kingdom.

What stories can we tell from our own experience to enrich such a moment?

Questions:

Have you experienced moments of worship or moments of blessing at the hand of God that seem to defy your ability to describe them? How does sensing the awe-inspiring nature of the living God enrich your faith life? Your love for others?

'Spanglish' worth trying

Cloris Leachman and Adam Sandler star in the comedy-drama "Spanglish," an observant and charming story about a non-English-speaking Mexican mother who takes a job as a housekeeper with an affluent California family to support herself and her young daughter whom she endeavors to keep unspoiled by superficial American values. Some sexual banter and mild profanity, an instance of rough language, and an unexplicit but rambunctious sex scene between husband and wife. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

First 'Apprentice' winner says nice guys can finish first

BY PATRICK BUTLER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CHICAGO — Nice guys don't have to finish last in the business world or anywhere else, "The Apprentice" winner Bill Rancic told participants at the Focus 2004 conference of the Chicago archdiocesan young adult ministry department.

Taking responsibility for your actions, being yourself, treating others with respect and staying flexible enough to change tactics without compromising your integrity can literally pay dividends in the long run, Rancic said at the November conference at Holy Name Cathedral and Vincentian-run DePaul University.

And some prayer won't hurt either, added the winner of the NBC reality TV show who started his own company to help pay his way through Loyola University.

Rancic, a Catholic, now gives back through volunteer work at Mercy Home for Boys and Girls and the cancer research foundation he and his family recently founded.

None of the cutthroats he competed against on the show made it to the final episode last April without hearing Donald Trump's trademark line, "You're fired," said Rancic.

"That (being cutthroat) only works on a very short-term basis. Take the high road. You don't have to tear someone down to pull yourself up," said the Chicago entrepreneur whose "prize" includes overseeing an $800 million Trump Tower construction project in Chicago.

Rancic and 15 other contestants were chosen from thousands of applicants to be on "The Apprentice" in its first season. They were brought together in New York City to vie for an apprenticeship with New York billionaire developer Trump.

While he realizes what a golden opportunity it is to work alongside Trump himself for a year, Rancic remains clear on who he is and where he wants to go.

"My goal is not to be a 20-year employee of the Trump organization. At the end of the day, I'm an entrepreneur.

My goal is to learn what I can learn and go off and do things on my own," said Rancic, who got his first taste of business at age 10 when he turned his grandmother's kitchen into a makeshift restaurant — without her knowledge.

One Saturday, when Rancic was visiting his grandma, she taught him how to make pancakes. The next day, "I invited all the old ladies in the neighborhood over for breakfast. I assumed they liked the pancakes, because when they left, they all left $5 bills under their plates," said Rancic.

He stayed in business for the next seven weekends — until his mother found $300 in his dresser drawer.

A few years later, while trying to earn money for college, Rancic said, he and a buddy learned their most important business lesson while running a $400-a-day business washing and waxing boats in New Buffalo, Mich.

"I created some neon orange flyers promoting our business and left them on every boat in the harbor hours before a heavy storm hit," he said.

"We failed to realize the neon orange dye would bleed when wet," said Rancic, who spent the next three days cleaning every boat for free.

It proved to be a good business move as well as the right thing to do, said Rancic. "We doubled our business. People respected us for fixing our mistake instead of walking away from the situation."

After college, he got a job but decided to go back to running his own business after seeing an employee fired after 30 years because he had become "too expensive."

"I promised myself I'd never let that happen to me," said Rancic.

Determined to find a business that would be "the right fit," Rancic eventually started a successful Cigar of the Month Club. It brought in $150,000 in sales during the first 30 days of business.

"It's publicly traded on NASDAQ and it's a stock you may want to look at," the tireless promoter said.

Panthers prowl pep rally at St. Patrick School

CHARLOTTE — Football fever recently spread to St. Patrick School.

The Catholic school enjoyed a Carolina Panthers pep rally that included a surprise visit from quarterback Jake Delhomme Dec. 7.

St. Patrick School competed against 500 elementary schools in the Harris Teeter "Milk, the Power Behind the Play" October milk jug cap contest. St. Patrick School turned in 10,361 milk jug caps to win the contest, which promotes healthy eating habits and exercise.

Harris Teeter teamed up with its contest sponsors, the Panthers and the Southeast United Dairy Industry Association (SUDIA), to entertain students and staff at St. Patrick School with the pep rally, featuring Sir Purr, the team mascot; two Top Cat cheerleaders and Delhomme.

The Panthers and SUDIA presented the school with checks totaling $3,000 for physical education and cafeteria equipment. Each student also received a "3 A Day" T-shirt, a Panthers' calendar and a Panthers' blueberry milk and cookie party after the pep rally.

Harris Teeter has been a long-standing financial supporter of education and has donated more than $5 million to schools through its Together in Education Program.

Making music happen

Billy Jonas brings unique musical experience to Catholic students

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Musician Billy Jonas recently brought his unique style of music and comedy to Asheville Catholic School.

Jonas is a composer, songwriter and multi-instrumentalist who performs original songs, stories and improvisations with voice, guitar and "industrial re-percussion" — a collection of instruments made from recycled objects. He divides his time between performances for adults and schools, libraries, churches and synagogues.

Jonas utilized his major in anthropology and minor in music from Ohio's Oberlin College to entertain Asheville Catholic's students Dec. 3.

After teaching the preschool through eighth-grade students to sign the alphabet and sing African chants, Jonas showed them how to make "drums" using a large garbage can, an industrial-sized plastic container and a stand made from a child's chair and skateboard. He demonstrated the various sounds that could be made by placing the "instruments" on the ground, on stands or holding them in the air.

Then two groups of students and Andrew Weatherly, who teaches drumming at the school, joined Jonas on stage to perform with the instruments.

Jonas said his favorite instrument is the audience, and getting people to sing along with him.

"Music can happen anywhere, anytime, with anyone or anything," he said.

Then Jonas helped the students create lyrics for a song of their own. A student called out "your haircut" as a topic, and the students began their work. After numerous lines, a poem resulted about a bad haircut that made Jonas "look just like his dad."

Jonas set the lyrics to music and a song was born.

In February, Jonas will return to the school to work with the fifth graders as part of the school's Artist in Residency program.

A Journey of Peace and Hope

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

May the grace and peace of Our Lord Jesus Christ be with you as we continue to celebrate the joy of the Christmas season.

During this week I ask you to remember in your prayers all immigrant and refugee peoples of the world, especially those here in our own diocese, as the Catholic Church in the United States celebrates National Migration Week from Jan. 2 through Jan. 8.

The theme for this year's observance is "A Journey of Peace and Hope." Today's world is a harsh one for the more than 35 million refugees and displaced persons. Desperate poverty still forces millions to seek conditions worthy of human life far from their native lands. Peace and hope are elusive for so many of our brothers and sisters. Pope John Paul II reminds us: "The aspiration to peace is rooted in the heart of a large part of humanity. That is exactly the ardent desire that spurs people to seek every possible path to a better future for one and all."

In the refugee and immigrant of today, we are reminded of Christ and His Holy Family, who were themselves refugees and people on the move. "In the foreigner a Christian sees, not simply a neighbor, but the face of Christ Himself, who was born in a manger and fled into Egypt, where he was a foreigner, summing up and repeating in His own life the basic experience of His people. Born away from home and coming from another land, he came to dwell among us and spent His public life on the move, going through towns and villages. After His resurrection, still a foreigner and unknown, He appeared on the way to Emmaus to two of His disciples, who only recognized Him at the breaking of the bread. So Christians are followers of a man on the move 'who has nowhere to lay his head' (Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58).

"In the same way Mary, the Mother of Jesus, can be equally well contemplated as a living symbol of the woman emigrant. She gave birth to her Son away from home and was compelled to flee to Egypt. Popular devotion is right to consider Mary as the Madonna of the Way." (Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant People, "The love of Christ towards migrants," May 3, 2004, n. 15).

Since 1975, more than 8,000 refugees have received assistance in our diocese through the Refugee Resettlement Office of Catholic Social Services. The refugee office maintains a philosophy of early employment, self-sufficiency and self-reliance to assure a smooth transition into our community. This commitment responds to the Holy Father's call to "listen to the cry for help that comes from a multitude of migrants and refugees... [and] foster, with active commitment, prospects of hope that will herald the dawn of a more open and supportive society." (Message for the World Day of Migrants and Refugees 2005, n. 4).

In his apostolic letter announcing the Year of the Eucharist, the Holy Father noted that the authenticity of our Eucharistic celebrations is judged by the way we respond to the many forms of poverty present in our world, among them the "struggles of immigrants" (Mane Nobiscum Domine, n. 28). The Eucharistic celebration must convert our hearts to greater love of God and neighbor. The sacrifice of Christ is a sacrifice of love, and by partaking of the sacrifice of his Body and Blood the charity of Christ must increase in our heart.

Through our care for the newcomers in our midst — by our prayer and active charity for them — let us work to make their journey in their adopted land a journey of peace and hope.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

As death toll soars, pope urges generous giving toward relief efforts

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — As the death toll from the Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunamis soared past 60,000, Pope John Paul II invited international agencies and individuals to give generously toward relief efforts.

Speaking at his weekly general audience at the Vatican Dec. 29, the pope said he was especially concerned at the risk of epidemics in the wake of the catastrophic flooding, which left beaches from India to Thailand littered with corpses.

He noted that Catholic agencies were mobilizing to respond to the humanitarian crisis, and he said he would continue to pray for the victims, the injured and the homeless in the region.

"The reports coming from Asia reveal more and more the enormity of this immense catastrophe, which struck especially hard in India, Indonesia, Sri Lanka and Thailand," the pope told a packed audience hall.

He praised the international community for rapidly mobilizing aid efforts and said the church's charitable agencies were doing the same. The previous day, the Vatican said at least $6 million in church aid had already been earmarked for the affected areas.

"In the Christmas spirit of these days, I invite all believers and people of good will to contribute generously to this great effort of solidarity toward populations that have been stricken and that are now exposed to the risk of epidemics," he said.

"I remain very close to them in affection and prayer, especially to those who have been injured or left homeless," he said.

Authorities said more than 3 million people had lost their homes, most of them poor families living in huts near coastal areas.

The World Health Organization warned Dec. 28 of potential epidemics of diarrhea, malaria and dengue throughout the disaster areas, largely because of lack of clean water and sanitation. One official said the diseases could eventually kill as many people as the waves that struck Dec. 26.

In his main audience talk, the pope asked Christians to reflect more deeply on the meaning of Christmas and welcome Jesus into their lives.

"Let us open our hearts to him so that he may come to us and stay with us every day of the new year," he said.

His audience talk was much shorter than in the past, and he pronounced the full text. Over the Christmas season, the Vatican dropped the practice of having aides read the bulk of papal texts; instead, the pope's talks were shortened considerably.

After the formal part of the audience, the pope, seated on a throne next to a Christmas tree, gave individual blessings to several hundred people, including many in wheelchairs.

A Christmas story for the 21st century

Tale of love endures through generations

It's just a small, white envelope stuck among the branches of our Christmas tree. No name, no identification, no inscription. It has peeked through the branches of our Christmas tree for the past 10 years or so. And so Michael's story begins.

Michael hated Christmas. It was not the meaning of Christmas he hated, but the commercial aspects of it — over-spending, the frantic running around at the last minute to get a tie for Uncle Harry and the dusting powder for grandma, the gifts given in desperation because you could not think of anything else.

Knowing he felt this way, I decided one year to bypass the usual shirts, sweaters, ties, and so forth. I searched for something special just for Michael. The inspiration came in an unusual way.

Our son Kevin, who was 12 that year, was wrestling at the junior level at the school he attended; and shortly before Christmas, there was a non-league match against a team sponsored by an inner-city church. These youngsters, dressed in sneakers so ragged that shoestrings seemed to be the only thing holding them together, presented a sharp contrast to our boys in their spiffy blue and gold uniforms and sparkling new wrestling shoes.

As the match began, I was alarmed to see the other team was wrestling without headgear, a kind of light helmet designed to protect a wrestler's ears. It was a luxury the ragtag team could not afford. Well, we ended up walloping them. We took every weight class.

As each boy got up from the mat, he swaggered around in his tatters with false bravado, a kind of street pride that could not acknowledge defeat. Michael, seated beside me, shook his head sadly.

"I wish just one of them could have won," he said. "They have a lot of potential, but losing like this could take the heart right out of them."

Michael loved kids — all kids — and he knew them, having coached little league football, baseball, and lacrosse. That's when the idea for his present came. That afternoon, I went to a local sporting goods store and bought an assortment of wrestling headgear and shoes and sent them anonymously to the inner-city church.

On Christmas Eve, I placed the envelope on the tree, the note inside telling Michael what I had done and that this was his gift from me. His smile was the brightest thing about Christmas that year and in successive years.

For each Christmas, I followed the tradition — one year sending a group of mentally challenged youngsters to a hockey game; another year sending gifts to a pair of elderly brothers whose home had burned to the ground the week before Christmas; and on and on. The envelope became the highlight of our Christmas. It was always the last thing opened on Christmas morning and our children, ignoring their new toys, would stand with wide-eyed anticipation as their dad lifted the envelope from the tree to reveal its contents.

As the children grew, the toys gave way to more practical presents, but the envelope never lost its allure. The story doesn't end there. You see, we lost Michael last year due to a dreaded cancer.

When Christmas rolled around, I was still so wrapped in grief that I barely got the tree up. But Christmas Eve found me placing an envelope on the tree, and in the morning, it was joined by three more. Each of our children, unbeknownst to the others, had placed an envelope on the tree for their dad.

This story, which my dad used to read to me every Christmas, reminds me of the real gift for a true Christmas. There may not be room for Christ in a crowded Bethlehem, but just the simple gift of shelter in your heart will make this Christmas special. It is to the whole world of men and women with their longings, their disappointments and their emptiness that he sends the supreme gift of his love — his love for the black person, the yellow person, the brown person, the red person and the white person.

"We may have people in leadership positions, but we sure don't have good leaders!" When I heard this comment by a group of academicians, it reminded me of my studies on leadership.

We had reviewed an evaluation instrument that defined leadership from two perspectives: task orientation and people orientation. A person measures up as a leader if he or she accomplishes a job expeditiously and at the same time is caring of co-workers.

We also took stock of charismatic leadership. Take, for example, Martin Luther King Jr. and President John F. Kennedy, who could move enormous crowds when they spoke. But why?

One reason is that they knew how to convey inner conviction, and they were visionary.

Charismatic leaders also possess personal, attractive traits. When in their presence, you feel they know you and care about you, and that they have been "there" with you in experiencing your problems and dreams. Being photogenic helps, but charismatic leadership goes deeper than this and touches hearts.

Yet another trait of charismatic leaders is that they often have suffered deeply themselves and have stood the test.

There have been many complaints about the church's handling of sexual abuse cases. From these complaints we see that one expectation of leadership is prudence.

Prudence dictates that leaders, when confronted with difficult problems, take immediate council and endeavor to get to the essence of the problems. Once these endeavors are exhausted and a judgment is reached, he or she is decisive, moving into swift action. Even if the judgment is not to his or her liking, or is not in his or her self-interest, a leader bites the bullet and doesn't flinch.

In this case, leadership is the practice of docility, good judgment, decisiveness and courage.

When we've said everything we can about leadership, we see that it is mysterious. It raises questions: Is leadership ability innate or is it developed? How do we explain a person who may be indecisive and very uninspiring in running his or her own home, yet can inspire an army to achieve the impossible?

What makes a leader's presence felt? Is leadership determined by time, place and circumstance? In the history of the church and civilization, we have seen individuals no one ever thought could lead turn into outstanding leaders.

Perhaps the most we can say about leadership is that we know we need good leaders today, but only God knows who he will choose for this or when he will do so.

What Cardinal Newman has to do with your resolutions

If you're thinking about making a good set of New Year's resolutions, why not turn to Cardinal John Newman for some genuine inspiration?

Cardinal Newman was born in England in 1801 and was brought up in the Church of England. He studied at Oxford and became an Episcopal priest in 1825. He soon became a leader in the Oxford movement, which emphasized the church fathers as a source of spiritual truth as opposed to modern Protestantism. His sermons were controversial and profoundly influenced the entire country.

In 1841 he began doubting his membership in the Anglican Church and soon resigned his post at St. Mary's Parish in the village of Littlemore. On Oct. 9, 1845, he was received into the Roman Catholic Church.

Today he is considered one of the greatest Christian thinkers of modern times. His main contribution to the thought of his age was in the field of psychological analysis, rather than in theology itself. He applied the idea of human development to the growth of Christian doctrine and eventually was made a cardinal of the church.

For Cardinal Newman, the incarnation was the central truth of Christianity. He died in 1890.

The following prayer of Cardinal Newman is a beautiful expression of his own purity of heart. Perhaps it will inspire your New Year's resolutions, as it did mine.

"Teach me, Lord, to be sweet and gentle in the events of life, in disappointments, in the thoughtlessness of others, in the insincerity of those I trusted, in the unfaithfulness of those on whom I relied. Let me put myself aside, to think of the happiness of others, to hide my little pains and heartaches, so that I may be the only one to suffer from them.

"Teach me to profit by the suffering that comes across my path; let me use it that it may mellow me, not harden and embitter me, that it may make me patient, not irritable, that it may make me broad in my forgiveness, not narrow, haughty or overbearing.

"May no one be less good for having come within my influence; no one less pure, less true, less kind, less noble for having been a fellow traveler in our journey toward eternal life.

"As I go my rounds from one distraction to another, let me whisper, from time to time, a word of love to you. May my life be lived in the supernatural, full of power for good and strong in its purpose of sanctity.

"Dear Jesus, help me to spread your fragrance everywhere. Flood my soul with your spirit and life. Penetrate and possess my whole being so completely that my life may be only a radiance of yours.

"Shine through me, and be so in me that every soul I come in contact with may feel your presence in my soul. Let them look up and see me no longer, but only Jesus."

Bishop Kevin C. Rhoades of Harrisburg, Pa., administers the sacrament of confirmation to 19-year-old Pfc. Nate Smith in the chapel of the bishop's residence in Harrisburg Dec. 27. Smith completed his Army training Dec. 17 at Fort Stewart in Georgia, and spent Christmas with his parents, before his early January deployment to Iraq.

Bishop confirms soldier before his deployment to Iraq

HARRISBURG, Pa. (CNS) — Just before being deployed to Iraq, 19-year-old Pfc. Nate Smith received the sacrament of confirmation from Harrisburg Bishop Kevin C. Rhoades in a small, private Mass in the chapel at the bishop's residence Dec. 27.

Smith, a member of Sacred Heart of Jesus Church in Lancaster, completed his Army training Dec. 17 at Fort Stewart in Georgia, and spent a Christmas holiday with his parents before his January deployment.

"This confirmation means a lot to me," he said as he sat with his parents and Father Michael Grab, pastor of Sacred Heart of Jesus Church, in the bishop's living room prior to the Mass.

"I was surprised and grateful when I heard he was going to do this for me," said Smith.

Smith was born and raised in California, where Catholics are typically confirmed during their last year of high school, but he missed receiving the sacrament and enlisted in the Army.

Smith's family moved to Pennsylvania in 2003. When their son was notified of his deployment, Smith's parents called Father Grab to try to arrange confirmation.

"I've always looked forward to being confirmed, and I've always told my mom I couldn't wait for it to happen," Smith said. "When I went into the military, I knew I wanted to be confirmed before I was deployed."

A week after Bishop Rhoades' Dec. 9 ordination as bishop of Harrisburg, Father Grab phoned the bishop to tell him about Smith's situation.

"I was pretty much expecting that the bishop would delegate me to do the confirmation because of the busyness of his schedule, but he offered to do it here in his chapel," Father Grab said.

Smith was Bishop Rhoades' first confirmation as bishop. When the bishop learned of Smith's sniper duties in Iraq, he promised to keep him in his prayers.

"You entered the Army after the war began, and that shows your courage," the bishop told him. "Courage is one of the gifts of the Holy Spirit you'll receive today."

The bishop said the confirmation of the young soldier during the Christmas season was a spiritually moving ceremony.

"This young man is obviously a man of faith," he said. "I could see it in his eyes and in talking to him that this confirmation was very important to him."

Florida appeals court rejects pleas to reopen case of Terri Schiavo

LAKELAND, Fla. (CNS) — The 2nd District Court of Appeals in Lakeland Dec. 29 denied an appeal from the parents of Terri Schindler Schiavo to reopen the severely brain-damaged woman's case, based upon statements by Pope John Paul II against euthanasia.

Schiavo, 41, has been impaired for the past 14 years and lives in a Clearwater nursing home. She can breathe on her own but requires nutrition and hydration through a feeding tube.

Her husband, Michael, who now has two children by another woman, says Terri would want the feeding tube removed. Her parents, Bob and Mary Schindler, say that she would want to live, in part because of her Catholic beliefs.

Schiavo's parents appealed a 2004 ruling by the Florida Supreme Court overturning a 2003 law that mandated the reinsertion of a feeding tube to keep Schiavo alive.

In the unanimous decision last year, the court said the law — dubbed "Terri's Law" — violated the state constitution's requirement of separation of powers by allowing the state Legislature and the governor to overturn a court decision.

Schiavo's parents appealed the law on the basis of the pope's position against euthanasia and that starving their daughter to death would violate her religious freedom. They say their daughter would agree with the church's position that providing food and water, even by artificial means, was "moral and obligatory."

The Schindlers can ask the appeals court to rehear the motion or can appeal the decision to the Florida Supreme Court. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has already asked the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the case.

Coffee bar on roof of St. Peter's Basilica is above the competition

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The neighborhood around St. Peter's Square is filled with coffee bars, but the bar at St. Peter's Basilica is above the competition.

Tourists in need of coffee, drinks or ice cream can enjoy their refreshments on the roof of St. Peter's Basilica, high above the square, at prices somewhat lower than those charged in Rome's tourist-filled neighborhoods.

However, unlike the typical Italian coffee bar, the new refreshment point does not sell beer, wine or other alcoholic beverages.

"Especially in the summer, it is very hot up there, and people who have climbed 349 steps up to the top of the dome and 349 steps back down to the roof need something to drink," said Pier Carlo Visconti, director of administration for the basilica.

"We wanted to offer refreshments, but it did not seem right to sell alcoholic beverages," he said.

The coffee bar opened for Easter 2004; the Vatican rents the space to a private caterer.

The bar is located in the same building as the souvenir shop operated by the Disciples of the Divine Master. The sisters have sold rosaries and religious gifts on the rooftop for more than 50 years.

The space occupied by the refreshment stand was an office until 1999; it was vacated when engineers and technicians cleaning and restoring the facade of St. Peter's completed their work.

While the coffee and cappuccino are served in ceramic cups, the cold drinks are served in plastic, requiring the strategic placement of garbage cans on the rooftop.

"So far, we have not had a problem with the garbage," Visconti said.

Vatican official: Church always needed proof of saint's intercession

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — From the earliest days, the Catholic Church would declare someone a saint only when there was a widespread reputation of holiness and evidence that favors were granted through the person's intercession, Msgr. Robert Sarno said.

Msgr. Sarno, of the Congregation for Saints' Causes, said, "Graces, favors and miracles were always part of the process," although the number and type of favors and the process for verifying them has changed throughout the centuries.

"Whether a miracle should be required for beatification and canonization has been a matter of continuing theological discussion," he said Jan. 3, adding that he knows of no recent formal proposals to change the current practice.

While the current requirements of one miracle for beatification and another for canonization are matters of church law, which can change, the church always has insisted that its formally proclaimed saints "are worthy of imitation and have interceded" with God to answer the prayers of the faithful, he said.

The church, he said, needs "some indication of divine confirmation that the person is in heaven."

The question of the miracle requirement was raised after Italian Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone of Genoa, former secretary of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, said that his former boss, Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, once discussed the possibility of removing the requirement of a miracle for beatification and for canonization.

If the proposal had gone forward, Cardinal Bertone said, "it is certain that a priest like Giuseppe Frassinetti would be a saint already."

The beatification of Father Frassinetti, a Genoa pastor, has been delayed because no miracle attributed to his intercession has been approved.

In the Dec. 26 edition of its weekly newspaper, the Archdiocese of Genoa said Cardinal Bertone had emphasized that Cardinal Ratzinger's suggestion was "a hypothesis," not a formal proposal.

In September 2003, Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for Saints' Causes, said miracles are important, especially because a canonization involves a papal declaration that the candidate is with God in heaven.

"Miracles serve as a confirmation from on high that the human judgment of the holiness of a servant of God is not wrong," he said.

Pope names Italian bishop to head Pontifical Academy for Life

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II has named Italian Bishop Elio Sgreccia, founding director of a Rome bioethics center, as the new president of the Pontifical Academy for Life.

Bishop Sgreccia, 76, had served as vice president of the academy since Pope John Paul established the body in 1994 to promote scientific studies related to the promotion and defense of human life from conception to natural death.

The Italian bishop succeeds Dr. Juan Vial Correa, a physician, biologist and rector of the Catholic University of Santiago, Chile, who presided over the academy for 10 years.

In the same Jan. 3 announcement, Pope John Paul had appointed Msgr. Ignacio Carrasco de Paula to be chancellor of the academy.

Msgr. Carrasco, a member of the academy and a priest of the Prelature of Opus Dei, is a professor of bioethics in the faculty of medicine and surgery at Rome's Catholic University of the Sacred Heart.

St. Therese Church hosting upcoming concert

MOORESVILLE — St. Therese Church in Mooresville is hosting a concert in January.

The concert, featuring the Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, will be held Jan. 19. The event, which is free and open to the public, is the second concert to be held at St. Therese Church this month — the parish hosted a performance by the Concert Choir of Xavier University in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Jan. 5.

The Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir is under the direction of Ivory Coleman. According to Father Cecile Tice, former pastor of Our Lady of Consolation Church, the only African-American parish in Charlotte, an aspect of the parish's mission was to blend African American culture with Catholicism. With that in mind, and using the African principles of Nia (purpose) and Imani (faith), the parish established Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir in 1980.

The music ministry of St. Therese Church, under the leadership of Phil Haigler, director of parish music ministries, invites all people to attend the concert. The programs will be full of excitement, energy and inspiration.

WANT TO GO?

The free concert will be held at St. Therese Church in Mooresville, at 7:30 p.m. on Wednesday, Jan. 19. For more information, contact Phil Haigler at (704) 664-3992.

"LAST KISS" by Rich Staley

Now available at Carolina Catholic Bookshope and Borders at Stonecrest

"Last Kiss" by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. "Last Kiss" is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

dedicated to the care, education and development of children with mental retardation and other disabilities.

As part of its open house Dec. 20, Holy Angels in Belmont celebrated a number of special events, with Morrow at the center of it all. The private, nonprofit facility founded by the Sisters of Mercy renamed its Main Center the Maria Morrow Center in honor of the first Holy Angels resident on her 49th birthday.

The facility also dedicated a garden in memory of Mother Mary Benignus Hoban, president emeritus; Mercy Sister Marie Patrice Manley, Holy Angels foundress; and all the children who have been served and the children who will be served in the years to come at Holy Angels.

It was nearly 50 years ago that Morrow's mother, who worked in a textile mill in Belmont, brought her daughter to a day care center under the direction of Sister Manley. When Morrow became seriously ill, her mother asked Sister Manley and the other sisters to care for her.

Morrow began to thrive with the sisters' attention and medical care, and she grew and developed far better than expected. Other parents of children with disabilities and mental retardation began to seek help from the Sisters of Mercy, and the sisters set up the home that eventually became Holy Angels.

As columnists began writing about Morrow and the Sisters of Mercy, more children and support came to the Sisters of Mercy. On Oct. 2, 1961, the feast of the Guardian Angel, a new wing was dedicated to assisting children. In 1972, the Main Center was opened.

Today, Holy Angels employs about 250 people and provides programs and services to 70 children and adults. Residents range in age from 6 months to 62 years of age. The facility includes four Intermediate Care Facilities for the Mentally Retarded (ICFMR) group homes and two supported-living homes, as well as an on-site day care center.

And Morrow has seen it grow.

Doctors had discovered she did not have mental retardation. She now works as a receptionist at the Holy Angels Specialized Community Residential Center and also helps out at Cherubs Candy Bouquets, Holy Angels' vocational program in downtown Belmont.

And Holy Angels is still growing.

During the open house, Holy Angels celebrated the official kickoff of construction on a new ICFMR group home. In addition to the 15-bed home, seven beds will be added to the current Belhaven eight-bed ICFMR home.

Residents who currently live in the Holy Angels Specialized Residential Community Center will move into the new group home, which will be close to the Maria Morrow Center so those residents who have severe and profound mental retardation, physical disabilities and complex medical conditions can be near needed medical and healthcare resources.

"I am pleased that the construction has begun on this new home," said Regina Moody, president and CEO of Holy Angels. "It means a great deal to the families and friends of those residents who will now be able to continue making their home at Holy Angels."

The new home will include bedrooms, a kitchen, dining room and living room and space for recreation, therapy and day programs. Funding sources for the $3.5 million project will include grants and private donors.

Plans are to complete the seven-bed addition to Belhaven by early spring, with construction for the new home to be completed by Holy Angels' 50th anniversary celebration in December 2005.

January focuses on poverty awareness in America

(CCHD), the domestic anti-poverty, social justice program of the U.S. bishops.

This month, which is Poverty in America Awareness Month, CCHD launches its fifth national awareness campaign. By focusing on poverty during January, CCHD hopes to remind Americans early each year that poverty remains very much a part of American life and that they can do something to help.

As part of their efforts, CCHD will release a new public opinion survey and public education campaign designed to raise awareness about poverty, educate the public to be sensitive to the needs of those living in poverty, and hold activities in Catholic schools and public settings to keep poverty in the minds of Americans.

"Even now, in this land of freedom and plenty, 34.6 million people are working to liberate themselves from poverty, struggling to afford the very basics — food, shelter, clothing, childcare and medical care," said Father Robert Vitillo, executive director of CCHD.

In September 2004, Father Vitillo spent four days in the Diocese of Charlotte visiting projects funded in part by CCHD.

The national poverty level rose 4 percent in 2003, equaling 1.3 million more people who are now poor, with North Carolina ranking third among the top 10 states with the greatest increase in poverty from 2002 to 2003. The state ranks 10th among the top 10 states with the highest poverty rate in the nation for 2002-2003.

While the White House's Office of Management and Budget defines the average poverty threshold as $18,810 for a family of four, a recent CCHD study showed that most Americans believe it takes nearly twice that amount ($35,000) to adequately house, clothe and feed a family of four.

Breaking the U.S. cycle of poverty is a primary concern for the U.S. bishops, and their mission is to address its root causes of poverty.

"CCHD was a program originally designed to alleviate poverty," said Terri Jarina, program director for parish social ministry for the Office of Justice and Peace of Catholic Social Services in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Over time, the U.S. bishops realized poverty is a bigger problem than originally thought, and their focus shifted to breaking the cycle of poverty," she said.

CCHD supports local groups involved in creating jobs, improving neighborhoods, training adults for employment at a living wage and raising leaders for the future.

"These programs form poor people into leaders in the community," said Father Vitillo. "CCHD works with the poor, rather than for the poor."

CCHD's success is due in large part to Catholic parishioners whose contributions to the annual appeal over the years have made meeting CCHD's objectives possible.

"This money helps thousands of people through the three national and 20 local grants the collection helped to fund in 2003," said Jarina.

Jarina encourages people in the Diocese of Charlotte to help others escape Poverty USA.

Mercy Sister Michael Reinhard dies at 89

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Michael Reinhard, 89, a member of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas Regional Community of Dallas, died Dec. 30, 2004 at Marian Center at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont.

A Mass of Christian Burial was held at Cardinal Gibbons Memorial Chapel with burial at Belmont Abbey Cemetery Jan. 4.

The former Glenn Reinhard was born Dec. 9, 1915, in Cumberland, Md. She entered the Sisters of Mercy on Sept. 8, 1943. She pronounced her vows on March 12, 1946 and was in her 61st year as a Sister of Mercy.

Sister Reinhard graduated from Allegany High School in Cumberland, Md. She received a bachelor's degree in English from College Misericordia in Dallas, Pa., in 1946; a master's degree in English from Fordham University in Bronx, N.Y., in 1954; and a master's in history from the University of Notre Dame in Indiana in 1962.

Sister Reinhard taught in elementary and secondary schools of the dioceses of Scranton, Pa., and Brooklyn and Rockville Centre, N.Y. She served on the faculties of College Misericordia in Dallas, Pa., for nine years and at Sacred Heart College in Belmont for 14 years. She also served as dean of women at College Misericordia, and on the graduate faculty at St. Mary's College in Scranton, Pa.

Mercy Sister Michael Reinhard

She served on the faculty and as the chairperson of the history department at Charlotte Latin School in Charlotte for five years. From 1992 until her retirement, she served as a substitute teacher in the Belmont public school system.

Sister Reinhard was in residence at Sacred Heart Convent since 1968 and in December 1999 moved to Marian Center, on the Sacred Heart campus, where she remained until her death.

Sister Reinhard is survived by the Sisters of Mercy of Dallas and North Carolina; her sister, her nephews and nieces, and her sisters-in-law.

Extending Communion in a 'lasting way'

Booklet explains, encourages eucharistic adoration

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. bishops' Committee on Liturgy has issued a resource booklet encouraging and explaining adoration of the Eucharist outside Mass.

Titled "Thirty-One Questions on Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament," the 41-page booklet highlights the importance of eucharistic adoration and its relation to the Mass. It explains the difference between adoration of the Eucharist in the tabernacle and the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament.

Appendixes include the texts of church regulations on worship of the parish, the universal church, and extend our charity to the whole world because we know that there are members of Christ everywhere."

It points out that church law recommends an extended solemn exposition and adoration of the Eucharist annually in all churches and oratories.

In an appendix it cites church regulations that say an extended solemn exposition requires the consent of the local bishop and should take place "only if suitable numbers of the faithful are expected to be present." A common form of extended exposition in parishes is the Forty Hours devotion.

The booklet also points out that the exposition of the Eucharist is a "public celebration" accompanied by liturgical rites, not something done simply for private devotion. Adoration can take place before the Eucharist whether it is exposed in a monstrance or ciborium or reposed in the tabernacle, it says.

"Eucharistic adoration is prayer before the Blessed Sacrament housed within the tabernacle. Eucharistic exposition is the ritual by which the Blessed Sacrament is displayed outside the tabernacle in a monstrance or ciborium for public veneration by the faithful," it says.

"What distinguishes the reverence given to the exposed sacrament from adoration before the tabernacle is the communal nature of reverence to the exposed sacrament," it adds.

It notes that perpetual adoration of the Eucharist, a practice that has become popular in a number of U.S. parishes in recent years, does not require perpetual exposition of the Eucharist. When a parish wishes to have the Eucharist exposed for an extended period of time, this is subject to the approval of the local bishop and regulations he may establish to govern the practice, it says.

Editor's Note: "Thirty-One Questions on Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament" can be ordered by phone at: (800) 235-8722; by fax at: (202) 722-8709; or online at: www.usccb.org.

Eucharist outside Mass, the reservation and exposition of the Eucharist, eucharistic processions and eucharistic congresses.

"Eucharistic adoration extends holy Communion in a lasting way and prepares us to participate more fully in the celebration of the eucharistic mystery," the booklet says.

"Pope John Paul II calls worship of the most holy Eucharist outside Mass 'an important daily practice (that) becomes an inexhaustible source of holiness,'" the booklet adds.

It highlights the social dimension of eucharistic adoration as well, quoting the words of Pope Paul VI: "Devotion to the divine Eucharist exerts a great influence upon the soul in the direction of fostering a 'social' love, in which we put the common good ahead of private good, take up the cause of the community, the

According to the mode of the receiver

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 2

Last week, we recognized that God still commands his people to "keep holy the Sabbath." As Christians, we do so by fulfilling the first precept of the Catholic Church: attending Mass every Sunday and holy days of obligation.

By participating in the holy sacrifice of the Mass, we hope to attain the two-fold purpose or goal of the Mass: 1) to give glory to God by praising, adoring and worshipping the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit, and 2) receiving the fruits of Christ's passion, death and resurrection in Holy Communion.

In short, we come to Mass prepared to give and receive: the two reciprocal parts of any relationship of love. And like any relationship, our relationship with God, expressed so fully and completely through the Mass, requires time, effort, desire and dedication, indeed, preparation, in order to receive what God has prepared. Therefore it is essential to spend a few moments considering our need to prepare for Mass.

Throughout the Middle Ages, there was a philosophical principle that was so common that its verity was simply understood and taken for granted: "What is received is received according to the mode of the receiver." What does that mean in everyday language?

Suppose two friends, both musicians, attend the Charlotte Symphony Orchestra. One of them plays the drums in a garage rock band. The other musician plays the cello in a local string quartet. Considering that both are listening to the same symphony and the same music, which of these two do you think will receive more from the performance?

Or suppose there are two identical windows in the same bedroom. One of them is dirty both inside and outside. The other window is clean and translucent. Given that the sun is shining outside, which window will allow more light to pass through and brighten the room?

Both examples demonstrate the principle that what is received is received according to the mode of the receiver. In every case, there is an objective reality, whether it is the beautiful music of a symphony or the light of the sun. Each passes through the receiver differently, depending upon the mode or receptivity or disposition of the receiver.

Similarly, there is an objective reality, an objective truth, in the Mass — that by divine power, through the instrumentation of the priest, bread and wine are changed into the body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ. This truth does not depend upon individual belief, just as the fact that the sky is blue is independent of individual belief. However, the graces that we receive from this sacrament depend upon our receptivity, our disposition, our readiness to receive them.

We receive as much grace as we are prepared to receive. Grace is not magic. Grace is not automatic. Going to Mass is not at all like using a vending machine: I show up, put a little money in the collection and receive my holy Communion. No. This is not the kind of giving and receiving that is characteristic of loving relationships.

Since the graces that I receive depend upon my receptivity, my disposition, my readiness, how should I prepare for Mass? First, I must be in a state of grace to receive holy Communion. That does not mean that I have to be perfect, but I must not be conscious of any mortal sins. If a person is conscious of lying or stealing or cheating or fornicating, he or she must first go to the sacrament of reconciliation before he can be admitted to holy Communion.

If he or she receives Communion conscious of mortal sins, the person commits a further sin of sacrilege. And so, as St. Paul states in his first letter to the Corinthians: "Whoever eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of profaning the body and blood of the Lord" (I Cor. 11:27).

On the other hand, if we receive worthily, in a state of grace, we receive immense graces, numerous blessings — we receive the gift of our redemption. The light of God's grace can only penetrate into the soul insofar as the soul is purified.

Besides approaching the sacred mysteries in a state of grace, we can also prepare for the holy sacrifice of the Mass with prayer. Prayer establishes the ongoing communication that we need to give and receive during the Mass. The holy exchange of gifts in the Mass is accomplished through the exercise of prayer, through speaking to God and listening to him. And so, this requires us to arrive early, with adequate time to prepare our souls for the Mass.

And so, in order to arrive at our two-fold goal of giving God due worship and receiving the gift of our redemption, we must prepare our souls adequately to receive his grace, which is not magic or automatic. No, what is received is received according to the mode of the receiver. We must develop our ear for the beautiful harmony of prayer; we must keep the window of our soul clean to allow God's love and grace to transform us with our cooperation.

My next column will continue our foundational material on the Mass by considering the Mass as a sacred ritual.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincoln.

Declaration of marriage nullity in the Diocese of Charlotte

Process governed by canon law

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Each year in the United States, 2 million couples walk down the aisle to be united in marriage. Of these, approximately half will see their union end in divorce.

The Catholic Church teaches that Christ instituted the sacrament of marriage. In doing so he enhanced the dignity of an institution already made holy in God's creation. Therefore, marriage is an enduring and exclusive partnership in which husband and wife establish a loving and life-giving relationship.

According to the Tribunal Office of the Diocese of Charlotte, it is for this reason the church views divorce seriously. The church does not accept that divorce can sever the actual bond of a valid marriage.

Not every marital relationship meets the standard that Christ established for marriage. While a marriage relationship may exist between the parties and have certain consequences, it is not necessarily the type of marriage bond that can be broken only by the death of one of the parties.

The nature of marriage nullity

The process of marriage nullity determines whether an indissoluble marriage bond was created when a man and woman entered their marriage. It must be proved clearly that this bond was not established in order to declare the marriage null. This proof must focus on grounds of nullity as recognized by church law and must apply to the marriage from its very beginning.

According to Dominican Father W. Becket Soule, a judge for the Tribunal Office of the Diocese of Charlotte, there are three reasons a "true and valid marriage" did not exist. The first is a "lack or defect in 'canonical form'" such as marriage before a justice of the peace or Protestant minister without the permission of the diocesan bishop.

Another cause for nullity is a pre-existing impediment, such as age, close family relationship or remarriage during the lifetime of a previous spouse.

Finally, marriage nullity may be granted because there was "a defect in the consent between the partners." For example, a bride and groom may not have fully accepted and understood the lifelong commitment of marriage. This is the most significant reason cited in most cases.

The diocesan tribunal, or church court, handles the marriage nullity process, working under a set of procedures and laws established as part of the universal law of the church.

Marriage nullity procedures

In the most common marriage nullity procedure, the first step for a petitioner — the person requesting the marriage nullity — is to approach the local parish priest or pastoral assistant, who will assist the petitioner in completing a preliminary questionnaire for submission to the tribunal. This questionnaire provides the tribunal staff with an overview of the marriage.

The tribunal contacts the other party to the marriage, the "respondent." The respondent's cooperation is not essential and, in the event of non-cooperation, the case can proceed, recognizing that the grounds of the case must still be proved.

In the ordinary course of events, both the petitioner and the respondent will be given the opportunity to review each other's written testimony, as well as any statements by witnesses not protected by the seal of confidentiality.

The length of time involved varies from case to case and depends on many factors. Both the petitioner and the respondent are encouraged not to plan a future marriage until the entire tribunal process is complete and the final decision rendered.

A favorable decision in the diocesan marriage tribunal must be reviewed by the Court of Appeal of the Province of Atlanta. This requires additional time, which may be substantial depending on the kind of case.

The Diocese subsidizes the tribunal. The diocese incurs costs of approximately $1,000 in processing a case. The petitioner is asked to assume a portion of the cost, which involves ordinary office expenses, telephone calls, fees for psychiatric experts, appellate court costs and other expenses.

Points to consider

Careful consideration should be given to the following points:

— A declaration of nullity by the church has no civil effects in the United States. It does not, therefore, affect rights in regard to matters such as property, inheritance, visitation of children, and the like. It has no effect on any children born of the union, in regard to rights or legitimacy, either in secular law or in church law.

— All tribunal matters are guarded by strict and sacred confidence.

— A tribunal process exists for church purposes only. No information can be transferred to or have any effect in any civil process.

— The diocesan tribunal accepts cases or petitions for review only after the civil divorce process has been completed.

Advocates to assist in marriage nullity process marriage nullity process, the Diocese of Charlotte initiated a tribunal advocacy program. Thirty-five advocates, both deacons and laity, from parishes around the diocese were recommended by their pastors to participate in the program.

"This is the first time the Diocese of Charlotte has attempted to incorporate the advocacy program into the tribunal," said Mercy Sister Jeanne Margaret McNally, a Defender of the Bond for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The program is geared to provide more in-field contact with both the petitioners and the respondents," said Father John Putnam, judicial vicar for the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

"The advocates will provide more personal contact and better instruction for the cases, which will benefit everyone all the way around," he said.

The advocates will assist the tribunal in dealing with people interested in pursuing a process for marriage nullity. In order to do so, the advocates are undergoing intensive classroom instruction one day a month from September through June. Topics of study include the theology of marriage, human sciences, an overview of canon law, the canonical process, jurisprudence (dealing with the sanctity of marriage), impediments and canonical form.

Yet, at all times, the sanctity of marriage must be preserved.

"The diocesan tribunal has the responsibility to uphold the indissolubility of the marriage covenant," said Father Putnam. "This is a true ministry of the Catholic Church, and an exercise of pastoral care."

"Anger and hurt often are part of the experience of divorce. Processes such as those offered by the tribunal can be pathways of healing and closure," he said.

Father John Putnam, judicial vicar, and Suzanne Sherill, a parishioner of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, talk during a training class for the tribunal advocacy program at the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Nov. 20, 2004.

"I felt I could help the process along by donating time, stewardship and talent," said Richard Borsuk, a parishioner of St. James Church in Concord who volunteered for the advocacy program.

"(My wife and I) see the effects on people who are trying to organize their lives after divorce," said Borsuk. "Some of these problems can't be easily resolved."

"There was a considerable amount of time required to put this program together, but the need for the advocacy program outweighed time and management constraints," said Sister McNally.

"We hope that one of the results of this program will be that the cases will be better instructed and that the judges will have someone to call on to get additional information for the process," she said.

Once the advocates complete their training in May, they will be recommended for canonical appointments by Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

'Best Catholic Writing' gets readers thinking

Numerous topics by Catholic writers explored in new book

REVIEWED BY BRIAN T. OLSZEWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It's a risky title: "Best Catholic Writing." Editor Brian Doyle doesn't debate what "best" means in his introduction, but he does explain what "Catholic writing" is. It may be by Catholics, or for Catholics, or of Catholics, but it is also "catholic" because, "Everything, seen with a clear enough eye, is meat for the Catholic mind."

And meaty it is. Readers might recognize the names of Andrew Greeley, Kathleen Norris or Margaret O'Brien Steinfels, but most of the writers are commercial unknowns. Who has written is less important than what they have written.

Few readers know writer Robert T. Reilly, of Omaha, Neb., but many will relate to his story about caring for a loved one with Alzheimer's. He writes, "I build my days around visits to her, not as corporal works of mercy, but as one of the joys of marriage. I love who she was, but I also love who she is."

Jesuit Father Gary Smith might be better known among the poor in the Portland, Ore., and in Uganda than among readers. But readers of "The Leper: Robert's Story" will find it impossible not to see Jesus in this deathbed scene described by Father Smith:

"O Robert, my man, my man, O Robert.' And then I knelt at the side of his bed and wept and wept. The paradox is that, in the end, the little guy had been stripped of everything but was surrounded by the dearest of his possessions, his friends."

And Christopher de Vinck's reflections on the late TV icon Fred Rogers may get readers thinking, talking, even writing, about their own Mr. Rogers memories.

Really, that's what this volume does. It gets readers thinking, whether the topic is the sexual abuse of children by clergy, steps in faith formation or wondering why God leads people to do certain things. It inspires readers to examine their own lives, maybe to commit or recommit themselves to living the Gospel.

Most of the writing in this collection comes from national publications, such as Commonweal, U.S. Catholic and National Catholic Reporter. None of the selections are from writers at diocesan newspapers, which tend to be local in focus, although they had an opportunity to submit work. And they will for future volumes.

Doyle, who is the editor of Portland magazine, published by the University of Portland, Oregon's Catholic university affiliated with the Congregation of Holy Cross, has extended a call for submissions for the 2005 "Best Catholic Writing."

In any collection not everyone will like every topic or style. There are several pieces that address the sexual abuse scandal — the topic that defined U.S. Catholicism in the last couple years. Yet some readers might have heard, read and seen enough of the topic with no need to digest more. The book also includes three pieces written in verse form. The writing is good, but the style seems out of place.

This 28-selection smorgasbord offers something for the person with only a few minutes to read every day as well as for the leisurely reader. It gives observers of Catholic writing an accurate idea of what constitutes "best," provides an excellent overview of Catholic thought, and records for future historians an idea of what was happening in the church in 2004.

Olszewski becomes the executive editor of the Catholic Herald, newspaper of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, this month.

WORD TO LIFE

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: JAN. 16, 2005

Jan. 16, Second Sunday in Ordinary Time.

Cycle A. Readings:

- 1) Isaiah 49:3, 5-6
Psalm 40:2, 4, 7-10
- 2) 1 Corinthians 1:1-3
- 3) Gospel: John 1:29-34

Detours can be groundwork for bigger things

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Several years ago, I left the familiarity of full-time parish religious education ministry to work for a government contracting firm based in Washington, D.C.

In the prayerful process of discernment and decision making, I reasoned that the change would be good. I would command a higher salary as a "telecommuting" marketing support representative, and I would be able to work out of my home, which sounded like a great option for a mother of three young children.

So for three months from my bedroom corner office, I participated in corporate conference calls, wrote reports and proposals, and fulfilled requests from clients all over the country — all the while becoming more disenchanted with the work I thought would become my life's new occupation. After a scant four months with the firm, I yielded to the inner call to return to parish work, wondering how I had so misread God's call or, worse, why God would lead me on such an ill-fated professional detour.

Three years later, when I was hired by our diocese to coordinate its first synod, I had the answer to that question, as I found myself repeatedly relying on skills that had been honed on the computer and the telephone in those few frustrating months. I came to realize that the "detour" had in fact comprised essential preparation for a task I could not have imagined at the time.

The job that I viewed as a deviation from God's plan was actually the groundwork for something beyond the scope of my limited occupational thinking.

This Sunday's Gospel reflects that same sort of insight on the part of John the Baptizer, who perceived that his prophetic work in the desert was about something bigger than himself — indeed it involved testifying on behalf of "someone" whom he had envisioned but never met. Similarly, the prophet Isaiah sensed his own purpose as one who was prepared from the womb to be the Lord's servant for the restoration of Israel.

It is doubtful that either John or Isaiah understood all the implications of God's call in their lives; nevertheless, they obeyed and trusted that the purpose would become clearer in time.

In his book "The Dream Giver," best-selling Christian author Bruce Wilkinson encourages each person to be attentive and obedient to the divine call or "dream" that is placed within, asserting that this dream literally is given by God to be fulfilled for the life of the world. The fact that many people are unclear or fearful about their life's purpose does not diminish their dream's importance.

Often it is only hindsight that brings clarity to the dream — but obedience, trust and perseverance, strengthened through prayer and experience, enable each person to bring God's vision to fruition.

Study finds growing negative treatment of religion on prime-time TV

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — U.S. television broadcast networks are treating religion much more frequently in their prime-time programming than they did in the 1990s, but the way they treat it has become decidedly more negative, according to a yearlong study by the Parents Television Council.

The council is an advocacy organization seeking to protect children against sex, violence and profanity in the entertainment industry.

The report was released in mid-December. It said that from Sept. 25, 2003, to Sept. 24, 2004, NBC "had a shocking 9.5 negative treatments for every positive treatment" of faith and religion, far more than any of the other six networks analyzed.

The others were ABC, CBS, Fox, Pax, UPN and WB.

Overall, while more than half the treatments of simple expressions of belief or disbelief were positive toward religion and only 7 percent were negative, the study found that negative treatments of religious institutions and doctrines outnumbered positive treatments by a nearly 3-1 margin.

Among portrayals of lay people for whom religion was a strong or central force in life, 34 percent were found to be negative and only 20 percent positive.

Clergy and consecrated religious men and women fared slightly worse, with 36 percent of the portrayals negative and only 15 percent positive.

In all categories the council also found a large number of religious treatments it regarded as mixed, which it described as "relatively balanced points of view with ultimately no side taken," or as neutral, "an ambiguous or an insufficiently substantial treatment of the issue" to make a judgment whether it was positive or negative.

Overall, 11 percent of the treatments studied were classified as mixed and 42 percent as neutral.

The 2004 study on prime-time TV and religion was the first by the council since it conducted such studies annually for five years in 1993-97.

In 1997, it found only 551 treatments of religion in 1,800 hours of original prime-time programming on six commercial broadcast networks, for an average of one religious reference every 3 hours and 15 minutes. The Pax network, which emphasizes family entertainment, did not make its debut until 1998.

The 2004 study found 2,344 treatments of religion in 2,385 hours of prime-time programming, for an average of just under one per hour.

While religious issues or themes are now being addressed more than three times as often, the level of negativity toward religion has risen significantly since 1997, according to the new study.

In its 1997 report the council said 42 percent of prime-time treatments of religion or faith were positive and 22 percent were negative.

Its 2004 report said only 22.1 percent of the treatments in the past year were positive and 24.4 percent were negative.

Removing Pax — which had 97 positive, 10 mixed or neutral and no negative treatments of religion — from the 2004 figures, the 2004 statistics for the six networks that were also studied in 1997 dropped to 19 percent positive treatments, with nearly 26 percent negative and the rest mixed or neutral.

"Religion and the public expression of faith is a crucial element in the lives of most Americans," said L. Brent Bozell, president of the Parents Television Council. "Our findings should challenge Hollywood to accurately reflect this in television content."

Frank Wright, president of National Religious Broadcasters, which joined in releasing the study, said, "This comprehensive study shows a clear disparity between the religious beliefs of most Americans and how those beliefs are reflected in television programming."

After NBC, the Fox network was found to be the next most negative toward religion with 2.4 negative depictions for every positive one.

WB and ABC had 1.2 negative depictions for each positive one, the study said.

It said these were "followed by UPN with one negative for every 1.1 positive, CBS with one negative for every two positive and Pax, which did not have a single negative depiction."

"Negativity toward religion grew steadily with each passing hour of prime time," the council said. "During the 7 p.m. hour, religious content was negative 16.9 percent of the time. In the 8 p.m. hour, 20.8 percent of the instances were negative. In the 9 p.m. hour, 27.5 percent of instances were negative, and in the 10 p.m. hour, 28.2 percent were negative."

The council's 2004 report, titled "Faith in a Box: Entertainment Television and Religion," is available on the Internet at: www.parentstv.org. The site also has similarly titled reports on the 1997 study and the findings of the 1993-96 studies.

Pope begins year with prayers for victims those engaged in relief efforts, the papal spokesman said Jan. 1.

The United Nations estimates some 5 million people were without proper shelter and nearly 2 million were in urgent need of food and water after a series of powerful tsunamis hit 12 Indian Ocean countries.

The death toll continued to climb to 140,000 people, but the United Nations said the true number of those killed in the disaster might never be known, because many bodies were washed out to sea.

In his first Angelus address of the new year, Pope John Paul expressed his continued concern for the people "hit by the tragic cataclysm."

Overlooking 40,000 people gathered for the noontime address in St. Peter's Square Jan. 1, the pope assured victims of his prayers, and he praised the international show of solidarity in bringing aid and relief to those most in need.

"The hope for better days in the coming new year, which begins today, rests upon this sense of human solidarity, along with the help of God," the pope said.

Earlier that day, the pope presided over a morning Mass in St. Peter's Basilica on the occasion of the feast of Mary, Mother of God, and World Day of Peace.

Ambassadors from the 174 nations that maintain diplomatic ties to the Holy See attended the Jan. 1 Mass. The pope gave special greetings to those diplomats representing the 12 countries affected by the Dec. 26 tsunamis.

During his Jan. 2 Angelus address, the pope reassured the faithful that God is always by their side, even in times of trouble.

"Faith teaches us that even through the most difficult and painful trials, as with the calamity in Southeast Asia, God never abandons us," he said.

WANT TO HELP?

Catholic Relief Services is providing immediate and ongoing assistance for the disaster victims. The Catholic community of the Diocese of Charlotte is responding to this need by collecting funds. Please consider making a donation to support this effort.

Indonesian Catholic center receives request for more body bags

MISSION PRIEST SURVIVES WAVES
NEAR QUAKE'S EPICENTER

JAKARTA, Indonesia (CNS) — Among the requests received by the Indonesian bishops' crisis center in Jakarta in the stricken Aceh province was for more body bags.

"People in Aceh have asked us to send more body bags because many of the bodies have not been evacuated yet," said Father Ignatius Ismartono, center chairman.

In Indonesia, most of the country's 94,000 casualties were in Aceh on the northern end of Sumatra Island, near the epicenter of an undersea earthquake that sent huge waves crashing into the island's coastline.

Moments after, concerned Indonesians swarmed the crisis center wanting to help the victims. The center began channeling donations to the affected areas Dec. 30, Father Ismartono said.

Franciscan Father Ferdinando Severi was at a mission in Meulaboh, about 75 miles from the epicenter of the magnitude 9 quake, to celebrate Christmas when disaster struck Dec. 26.

The combined effects of the earthquake and tsunamis destroyed 80 percent of the buildings in Meulaboh and caused more than 10,000 deaths in town, with thousands more missing.

Franciscan Severi remained to assist victims, but locals who did not know him but knew that the Indonesian government does not allow foreigners in Aceh took him to authorities, who evacuated him to Banda Aceh.

New Year's resolutions for Catholics and the media

Both can learn much from each other

A curious thing happens during week 52 of each year: A few days after the most excessive indulgence of the year, we make resolutions to change and improve our lives. After stuffing ourselves with turkey, ham, "all the trimmings" and enough sweets to turn us all into pillars of sugar, we resolve to lose weight, to read the classics or to be nicer to people.

Perhaps these "healthy" resolutions are an echo of the lessons of Christmas and a tribute to the simple life that our Lord led during his time on earth. But let's be honest — the pledge to lose 10 pounds may also be made because our clothes don't fit.

In the spirit of the season of making promises that aren't always kept, I offer the following list of resolutions for Catholics and the media:

For Catholics, we resolve to:

- understand that the mainstream media will almost never provide a scriptural viewpoint. To obtain that, you have to do your own research. You will be amazed at how much thought-provoking, Scripture-based information you can find on almost anything worth discussing by visiting the Web site of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, www.usccb.org.

- recognize that most print and broadcast news organizations exist to sell dog food, diapers, diet drinks and other advertised specials. Informing the public comes second. Since advertising is all about getting our attention, it's easy to understand why the news we read and watch has that same blaring quality. Let us recognize that what the media presents is usually noisy and sometimes interesting, but not always informative.

- listen to and read more than one source of information to understand the issues of the day. Fox News doesn't have all the answers; neither does NPR. The truth lies somewhere in between.

- remember that opinions are like belly buttons — everyone has one. Rush Limbaugh's isn't any better than Michael Moore's (opinion that is — I've never seen either man shirtless and frankly, I don't want to).

- devote time to the Eucharist. This is the Year of the Eucharist and this newspaper and the Diocese of Charlotte will spend a great deal of time exploring this worthwhile subject during the next 12 months.

For the media, please resolve to:

- moderate your relentless focus on the bottom line. Broadcasters, since they are using the public air-

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

waves, have a duty to consider what programming is important to the local audience before they think about how much gold they will collect from advertisers every quarter.

- stop taking the Lord's name in vain. You've done a good job in keeping words about certain bodily functions and others that are racially derogatory off the air and out of print. Please add profanation of God's name to that worthy list.

- don't be afraid of adapting Scripture stories to the small and big screen. Bible stories have been around for more than 5,000 years. There is something to be said for that kind of staying power. And, Mel Gibson's movie, "The Passion of the Christ," proved that a profit could be turned on a well-made story from Scripture.

- explain the differences between the religions of the world instead of trying to evoke a "one god fits everybody" point of view, or worse, focusing more attention on the differences between faiths. Catholics can learn much from the experience of Muslims and Jews, among others, and they can gain from us. Help us to explore our similarities before we discuss our differences.

This year, it's "Merry Christmas," not "Happy Holidays."

David Hains is the director of communications for the Diocese of Charlotte. Contact him at dwhains@charlottediocese.org.

No waves here, but still victims abound

Don't forget your neighbors when giving

According to a recent story on Catholic News Service, U.S., Canadian and British Catholic aid agencies said support for victims of the Indian Ocean tsunamis surpasses the response to previous disasters.

Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' agency for overseas aid and development, raised $17 million in the first nine days after launching its appeal to help victims of tsunamis that hit 12 countries in Asia and Africa Dec. 26. The money is being applied to the $25 million that CRS pledged to provide to countries most affected by the disaster.

This, of course, is wonderful news! It shouldn't be surprising that these relief agencies see record giving levels for the tsunami relief; the disaster, after all, was record breaking, as was the number of victims, which continues to rise — around 140,000 people, at last count.

I pray for the victims and their families; I can't begin to imagine their suffering. And I sincerely applaud everyone who has tried to make a difference to help those victims, either through donations of time, talent or treasure.

Tragedies such as the tsunamis, Sept. 11, 2001, and hurricanes seem to bring out the best in people. When we see mass suffering on television, we feel compelled to help. That's human compassion at work.

While it's reassuring that there are still many good people in this world, I can't help but think of other victims who endure tragedies every day. We don't have to go around the globe to find them, but most of the world will never hear about them, nor try to help.

Almost daily, families all over our country experience house fires. My wife, who works in disaster relief for the American Red Cross, was called out several times over the holidays to assist such families. She has seen their shock of watching their homes, possessions and valuables go up in flames. While they are grateful for their lives, the fear and doubt about their unknown futures wear heavily on their faces. They have lost everything. Now what?

Organizations such as the American Red Cross do tremendous work — mostly through volunteers and others who donate their time, resources and money — to help victims all around the world, including the tsunami victims. But often these organizations have trouble raising funds or attracting volunteers for efforts right here at home. Many people want to fly to Thailand to assist tsunami victims; very few want to get up at 3 a.m. to help house fire victims down the street. Why is that?

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

On a similar note, almost 36 million Americans live in poverty, and the national poverty rate is increasing. North Carolina ranks third among the top 10 states with the greatest increase in poverty.

For the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, January is Poverty in America Awareness Month. It's a month to remember those who suffer every day, in this country, often in our own neighborhoods. Every day, people across North Carolina are suffering; and they need our help.

In his Gospel, Luke writes about Lazarus, a poor man covered with sores who longed to satisfy his hunger with scraps that fell from the table of a rich man, who ignored Lazarus. Upon their deaths, it was only Lazarus who went to heaven.

While we should feel compelled to help when we see our brothers and sisters suffering on television, we can't forget or neglect those who are suffering in our own backyards, hoping to catch scraps from our tables. Our baptism as Catholics calls us to action. Get involved. Volunteer at your church, in your community. Make a difference.

I heard Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin once say we should "see Christ in all people, and be Christ to all people." A person can still be a victim without a tsunami; we shouldn't wait for a tsunami to wash through to show compassion for others.

The length of time Christ is present in the Eucharist

Q. Is there a church teaching on how long Christ is in the Eucharist? (Louisiana)

A. Catholic doctrine states when bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ in the celebration of the Eucharist, our Lord's Eucharistic presence remains as long as the species (appearance) of bread and wine remain.

Obviously, once we receive the consecrated wine and bread in Communion, our digestive processes affect them just as other food, until they are no longer identifiable as the bread and wine we consumed. When that happens, after maybe 15 or 20 minutes, Christ is no longer present as a sacrament.

However, the relationship with the life and person of Christ, which we call grace, is greatly enhanced by our celebration and reception of the Eucharist. It is a major way God invites and unites us to an ever greater friendship with him.

This intimate presence of Jesus, which grows also through the other sacraments, prayer, charitable works and a good life, does not cease when the sacramental presence of our Lord ceases. It continues to develop unless it is diminished or lost by sin, which is a deliberate turning away and rejection of that relationship.

Here we go again: New Year's resolutions

Resolutions should be for right reasons

I don't know yet if the New Year's resolutions are more volatile than the Lenten resolutions. Here we go again with giving up candies, chocolate, coffee, smoking. My advice? Don't do all of the above in a one-shot deal.

I do know that it is good to make resolutions and keep them. What principles do we follow in making and keeping our resolutions? The text of St. Matthew may unravel the answer for which we are looking: "I tell you, said Jesus, unless your holiness surpasses that of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not enter the kingdom of God" (Mt. 5:20).

In our pluralistic culture, we are bombarded on every side with isms, cults and voices, which, apparently, all show the highway to God. Jesus, however, knew the moral theology before the theologians wrote those big volumes in Latin. Jesus doesn't require pious, outward religious trappings, right actions according to the law. He is infinitely more interested in the right reason for our actions.

Jesus goes beyond our moral principles: he tells us to do the right thing for the right reason. A paradigm through proper liturgical motions doesn't make anybody better or worse. Prayer or the absence of it makes us better or worse. Our good Lord goes beyond "Thou shall not kill." He adds, "Thou shall not hate."

Our resolutions, therefore, should be right and for the right reason.

Another quality of good resolutions is confidence that we can do them. A poet and an artist examined a painting by Nicholas Poussin representing the healing of the blind man of Jericho. The artist asked, "What seems to you the most remarkable thing in this painting?"

The poet said, "Everything in the painting is excellently portrayed — the form of Christ, the grouping of the individuals, the expression in the faces of the leading characters," etc.

The artist seemed to find the most significant touch elsewhere. He said to his friend, pointing to the steps of the house in the corner of the picture: "Do you see that discarded cane lying there?"

"Yes, but what does that mean?"

"My friend, on those steps the blind man sat with the cane clutched tightly in his hand, but when he heard Christ come, he was so sure he would be healed that he let his cane lie there, since he would need it no more and hastened to the Lord as if he could already see. Is not that a wonderful conception of the confidence of faith?"

He was right. Too often we hold on to canes and crutches and other means of self-help paraphernalia, instead of going to the savior, who can make sense of our non-sense.

Good resolutions rely on God, but our "yes" is required. Our life is a beautiful tapestry of light and shadows weaved with courage, fear, love and hate. The beauty of that tapestry is not what comes into your life that makes the pattern; it's the use you make of it that counts. Having the humility of not being the smartest, the best and the infallible makes things much easier for effective resolutions.

Pope, Vatican audience observe silent prayer for tsunami victims

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS AERVICE

VATICAN CITY — As the countries of the European Union marked an official day of mourning for the victims of the Indian Ocean tsunamis, Pope John Paul II once again asked people to join him in prayer for the dead and those left "in great difficulty."

Ending the pope's Jan. 5 audience precisely at noon, papal aides announced that the pope and the Vatican were joining people throughout Europe in observing three minutes of silence and prayer for the tsunami victims.

After the three minutes of silence, an official led the recitation of the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary and a prayer for the dead.

During his audience talk, the pope prayed that Mary would watch over the world and protect it during the New Year, "marked as it is by a deep concern for the sufferings which the people of Southeast Asia are presently undergoing."

He repeated a Marian antiphon sung by cantors at the beginning of the audience: "Loving Mother of the Redeemer, Queen of Peace, assist your people, defend them from all danger, be with the church on her journey to our heavenly home."

The audience had its lighter moments, as well. In addition to greeting more than a hundred visitors individually and kissing dozens of babies and children, the pope revealed his loyalty to the soccer team in the Polish city where he was archbishop.

At the audience, the pope told Polish speakers that the Krakow Sports Club was celebrating its 100th anniversary.

"I have been tied to them for years," he said, wishing the team "much success on the sports field and in its educational activity."

Members of the team also had a private afternoon audience with the pope Jan. 4.

At the private gathering, the pope told club members, "I know that in the course of this century there were years of splendor, but difficult times were not lacking."

"I am pleased to hear that the past couple years have brought new successes," he said. "I hope that there are even more."

The pope encouraged team members to be examples of how sports can form character and teach "the nobility of competition and solidarity."

The perfect gift

Many ways to be mindful of the poor

It is a brand new year and all the holiday hustle and bustle is behind us — well, for most of us anyway. As program director for Parish Social Ministry in the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace, I sometimes feel like the Grinch who steals the "enjoyment" the rest of year.

Why do I feel like a Grinch? Because a major portion of my job is to encourage all of us "... to be mindful of the poor" (Gal. 2:10).

One of my responsibilities is working with the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD), the domestic anti-poverty program of U.S. bishops. This month, CCHD launches its fifth national awareness campaign during "Poverty in America Awareness Month" with the unsettling news that nearly 36 million Americans live in Poverty USA, according to the most recent U.S. Census figures.

While many of us were preoccupied with searching for the "perfect" gift during the holidays, one out of six children in our country went to bed hungry, most likely without a warm coat or a home. There are 18 Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte, and the national rate of children living in poverty would equal the student population of almost three of those schools.

The national poverty rate rose from 12.1 percent in 2002 to 12.5 percent in 2003. This .4 percent increase represents 1.3 million more people who are now poor. The Office of Management and Budget defined the average poverty threshold in 2003 as $18,810 for a family of four. A recent CCHD study shows that most Americans believe it takes nearly twice that amount ($35,000) to adequately house, clothe and feed a family of four.

The CCHD Web site, www.povertyusa.org, illustrates that a number of essentials are left out of an $18,810 budget. People living in the state of poverty face difficult decisions every day — whether to pay for health care or child care, whether to purchase school supplies or whether to buy shoes or a birthday gift.

Sadly, North Carolina ranks third (at 1.6 percent) among the top 10 states in the United States with the greatest increase in poverty from 2002 to 2003. The state ranks tenth (at 14.2 percent) among the top 10 states with the highest poverty rate in the nation for 2002-2003.

Fortunately the news is not all bad. The CCHD "Poverty in America Awareness Month" campaign offers hope for the future. The good news includes a safe haven for at-risk youth in Asheville, assistance with safe and affordable housing in Franklin and organizing for racial justice in western North Carolina — all right here in our diocese. These endeavors and more are the result of the community-based, self-help projects that are funded by CCHD.

Hopefully, by now you are asking "what can I do?" about the state of poverty. Luckily there are a number of options. To start, visit www.povertyusa.org or www.pobrezausa.org, or contact the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace to educate yourself on the reality of poverty in America.

Additional options include becoming an advocate with and for those who live in poverty; participating with any of the organizations that receive national or local funding from CCHD; and/or donating your time, resources, concern and compassion. You also can look for the television, radio and print ads promoting "Poverty in America Awareness Month" and contact me to let me know when you see or hear one of them.

Monstrance blessed by pope to be used in vocations drive

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — During 2005, U.S. and Canadian parishes will be able to display a monstrance blessed by Pope John Paul II to stimulate prayers for vocations, said Father Edward J. Burns, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Vocations and Priestly Formation.

The aim is to send the monstrance to different dioceses to promote prayer services built around adoration of the consecrated host, he said.

A monstrance is an exposition case and stand used to display the Eucharist for adoration.

"The official kickoff will be Jan. 12 in the middle of vocations awareness week," Father Burns told Catholic News Service Jan. 3.

On Jan. 12, the monstrance is scheduled to be used during a day of eucharistic adoration at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, with a closing Mass celebrated by Bishop Blase J. Cupich of Rapid City, S.D., chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Vocations.

After that the monstrance will go to Chicago for a Jan. 14-16 gathering sponsored by Serra International, a Catholic organization promoting vocations to religious and priestly life, said Father Burns.

Plans for the rest of the year have not been finalized yet to give bishops time to request the presence of the monstrance in their dioceses, said Father Burns.

His office and Serra International are organizing the tour. Also involved in promoting the tour is the Legionaries of Christ, a religious order of priests.

The monstrance was given to the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops by the Vatican, which is promoting eucharistic adorations and expositions as a way of praying for vocations during the 2004-05 Year of the Eucharist declared by the pope, said Father Burns.

The Year of the Eucharist began last Oct. 17 and will conclude next October with a world Synod of Bishops having the Eucharist as its theme.

The monstrance is one of six blessed by the pope last November, said Father Burns.

Each monstrance was sent to a different region of the world as a symbol of the connection between the Eucharist and priestly vocations, he said.

"This is our opportunity to be in solidarity with the world in praying for vocations," he said.

The six regions given a monstrance are: the United States and Canada, Latin America, Europe, Asia, Africa and the Pacific.

"It's part of a Vatican initiative to launch vocations worldwide," said Daniel Gonzales, national director of a Legionaries of Christ Web site at www.vocation.com.

He added that the Legionaries have been working with the Vatican to promote prayers for vocations during the eucharistic year.

Parish celebrates birthday, legacy of beloved former pastor

BELMONT — Parishioners squeezed into Queen of the Apostles' Family Life Center to honor their former pastor.

They stood and applauded as Msgr. Anthony Kovacic, flanked by the Knights of Columbus color guard, entered the center for his parish birthday celebration Jan. 9, two days before his 85th birthday. While he suspected a party, Msgr. Kovacic was unaware that Bishop Peter J. Jugis would be on hand to rededicate the center, renamed the Msgr. Anthony Kovacic Parish Center in honor of the man who was instrumental in its creation.

"To all of you, I am most grateful," Msgr. Kovacic said to the crowd. Then, jokingly, "Now I'll have to learn the new name of the center."

During his time as pastor from 1985 to 1994, Msgr. Kovacic saw a need for not only a facility for Catholic instruction but a place where the parish could meet in fellowship.

Caitlin Connors, a sophomore at Padua Academy in Wilmington, Del., made more than 300 pink scarves that were sold to raise money for breast cancer research. Caitlin remembered that mothers of some of her former schoolmates at St. Mary Magdalen had developed cancer and the mother of a friend of hers had died of the disease.

Delaware teen makes pink scarves to help in fight against cancer

WILMINGTON, Del. (CNS) — Caitlin Connors was in a fabric shop in late October when she saw a pink fleece fabric with dark pink ribbons, signifying Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

Caitlin, a sophomore at Padua Academy in Wilmington, remembered that the mothers of some of her former classmates at St. Mary Magdalen School had developed cancer, and the mother of a friend of hers had died of the disease.

"I wanted to do something to help them," said Caitlin.

The pink fabric gave her an idea.

For her confirmation project, Connors made and sold fleece scarves and donated the proceeds to the American Cancer Society to help women with breast cancer.

She underestimated how popular the scarves would be.

"We got enough material for 56 scarves," she said. "The first day after orders went out, I got 127 orders. I kind of panicked."

The orders kept coming — 310 in all. Caitlin and her parents scoured local shops for more pink fleece material. They enlisted the help of Connors' grandmothers, both of whom live in the Philadelphia area, and ended up with five different patterns.

Shortly after Thanksgiving, barely a month after she came up with her idea, Caitlin presented $1,550 to the American Cancer Society — $5 for each scarf she sold for $8. The remaining $3 covered supplies.

Her donation will help fund the cancer group's Ladies Charity Golf Classic at Delaware National Country Club in August to raise more funds for services for those with breast cancer.

Most of the five-foot-long scarves were sold through St. Mary Magdalen School. Caitlin asked Barbara Wanner, the school's principal, for permission to send an order form home with students.

"Over the years, we've had too many young women develop breast cancer," Wanner said. "I think because breast cancer has touched so many people's lives in our parish and in our school community, people responded."

Selling homemade items is nothing new for Caitlin, who has also sold cloth bags to friends to use as backpacks.

"I like to do designing and sewing," she said.

Her next project? Caitlin made still more scarves as Christmas presents. She had more fleece — but not pink this time — and she had only a dozen to make, not 300.

Thomas Merton scholars upset by monk's absence in upcoming catechism

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new catechism for adults, currently awaiting Vatican approval, has some scholars up in arms not over the actual text, but over what is missing.

Early editions of the upcoming "U.S. Catholic Catechism for Adults," which went through four years of writing and fine-tuning, led off with a section on Trappist Father Thomas Merton. But the Kentucky monk, who became well known for his best-selling autobiography, is not in the catechism's final draft.

Instead, the book begins with a description about St. Elizabeth Ann Seton. The replacement did not go unnoticed by Merton scholars who started a petition drive to get him back.

The catechism, which will be the first of its kind in the United States aimed specifically at adults, contains brief biographies of saints and other well-known people of faith, and is meant to be a complement to the universal "Catechism of the Catholic Church" issued in 1992 by Pope John Paul II.

Msgr. Daniel Kutys, deputy secretary for catechesis in the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' education department, said that during early consultations on the text some suggested that it contained too many stories about men and not enough examples of women. Seton was chosen to replace the Merton entry not only for her gender, but because she, like Merton, was a convert to Catholicism.

The final draft, approved by the U.S. bishops at their November meeting, has been sent to Rome where it must receive a "recognitio," or confirmation, from the Holy See before it can be published as an official catechism.

In the meantime, Merton scholars hope to generate support for the missing section.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope offers prayers for babies baptized in the past year

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Although for the second year in a row Pope John Paul II did not baptize any infants on the feast of the Baptism of the Lord, he did offer special prayers for the world's newest, smallest Catholics.

"My thoughts go to all the children who were baptized during the course of the past year," the pope told thousands of people gathered in St. Peter's Square Jan. 9 for the recitation of the Angelus prayer.

"I embrace them and bless them," he said.

"I also bless the godfathers and godmothers and, especially, the parents of the newly baptized, asking all of them to cultivate, with their words and their example, the seeds of divine life sown by the sacrament of baptism," the pope said.

The pope told the crowd that just as Jesus' public ministry began with his baptism in the Jordan River, the mission of each Christian begins with his or her baptism.

Church efforts to preach the Gospel, he said, must include giving adults, who were baptized as babies, further formation in their faith and in the meaning of baptism.

"Renewing, in a more mature way, one's adhesion to the faith is necessary for a real and full participation in the eucharistic celebration, which is the summit of church life," the pope said.

Pope repeats call for end to U.S. economic embargo against Cuba

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II called for an end to the U.S. economic embargo against Cuba so that adequate conditions for the Caribbean island's development could be met.

The pope made his comments Jan. 8 to Cuba's new ambassador to the Holy See, Raul Roa Kouri, as the diplomat presented the pope with his letters of credential.

"The Holy See strongly desires that obstacles that hinder free communication and exchange between the Cuban nation and part of the international community be overcome as soon as possible," the pope said.

Ending the blockade would reinforce, "through respectful and open dialogue with everyone, the conditions necessary for real development," said the pope.

The United States has maintained a trade and travel embargo against Cuba since 1961 in an effort to topple the communist government led by President Fidel Castro.

In his address, the pope praised Cuba's progress in providing health care and education to its citizens, adding that the "Holy See considers assuring these conditions of human existence (to be) some of the pillars upon which peace is built."

Peace, "which is not just the absence of war," also involves the promotion of the full human person, fostering the "health and harmonic growth of the body and spirit" for all people, he said.

The pope, who visited Cuba in 1998, commended the country's strong sense of solidarity to people suffering from war, poverty or natural disasters. He emphasized the need for greater religious liberty in Cuba, especially in easing the process required for foreign priests and religious to enter the country.

So that the church in Cuba can continue to promote the common good of the people there, "it is desirable that, in an atmosphere of genuine religious freedom, (the church) be able to maintain and expand its already existing links of solidarity with other sister churches," the pope said.

The pope also urged allowing the church to express its views in the public sphere as well as opening up dialogue with all Cubans.

Cuba has been accused of human rights violations, including the jailing of political dissidents.

In his Jan. 8 address, the pope called for "dialogue with all groups that make up the Cuban people."

Bishop Jugis homilies to be posted online

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis will begin posting his Sunday homilies online at the Diocese of Charlotte's Web site.

A link on the Home page will take visitors to a listing of the bishop's available homilies. The first homily to be posted was given at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Jan. 9, during the Mass celebrating the feast of the Baptism of the Lord.

Posting the homilies online represents another channel of communication from Bishop Jugis to the nearly 300,000 Catholics in the 46-county diocese. Other channels include The Catholic News & Herald, periodic pastoral statements, the bishop's regular appearances at Masses and services and meetings throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.

Franciscan Fathers Michael Lorentsen and John Frambes speak to a group of participants about the Franciscans and tell relatively similar stories about their entry into the religious order at a Vocation Awareness Day given at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro Jan. 9.

Religious, laity gather to discuss vocations to listen to speakers and attend workshops regarding vocations as part of National Vocation Awareness Week, which ran Jan. 9-14.

"This was an important endeavour for the start of National Vocation Awareness Week," said Sister Svatos. "The presentations by the various religious communities are representative of our northern region (of the diocese)."

Workshop presenters included Franciscan Father John Frambes, campus minister at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro; Mercy Sisters Angela Perez and Jill Katherine, co-directors of vocations for the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont; Sisters Poor Servants of the Mother of God Lucy Hennessey and Clare Houlihan of Maryfield Nursing Home in High Point; Sister of St. Joseph Phyllis Tierney, pastoral associate at St. Pius X Church; Sister of St. Joseph Mary Elizabeth Karalis of Our Lady of Mercy Convent in Winston-Salem; and John Cahill, a seminarian studying for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Father Johnathan Hanic, parochial vicar of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem, gave the keynote address.

Describing a vocation — a calling

— as the "mystery of God speaking to you," Father Hanic spoke about how "God manifested his will in my life."

"The church has something to say about the religious call ... it was Jesus who chooses you. You do not choose him," said Father Hanic. "I am here to share the joy, happiness and bliss that is found as one becomes a servant of God. I have given nothing. It has all been given to me."

Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church, said there are two obstacles people face in following a religious vocation. The first is the "fear of loneliness."

"Yet, I appreciate my time alone with God, along with the solitude it brings," he said. "The second obstacle is the fear of commitment. However, I find that it is my 'family of faith' that nourishes my commitment."

"I am pleased to have several people (at my parish) interested in pursuing vocations to the priesthood," said Msgr. Marcaccio.

The faith of the religious communities represented made positive impressions on the youths in attendance.

"People who are religious leaders are normal people," said Patrick Lewis, an eighth-grader at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro. "I am not yet ready to make a decision about the priesthood, but maybe some day."

Theresa Benson, a ninth-grader at Hopewell High School in Huntersville, may have already received her calling.

"I felt called to be a nun," she said. "I know now that I need to pray about it."

"I wanted to explore the possibility of being a sister," said ninth-grader Josie Fink, a parishioner of St. Mark Church in Huntersville. "I still have a lot of time for that decision. If I leave things to God, they will work out."

Not all vocations are to the religious life, however.

The term "vocation" indicates the call of Christ, which is offered to all baptised persons in order that they follow him by becoming living signs and witnesses to the Kingdom of God. Thus all followers of Christ share in this common vocation.

There are several ways in which the faithful can follow Christ — while some vocations are realized through the taking of holy orders to the priesthood, others are through vows as religious brothers and sisters, through marriage or the single life.

Each of these elements leads to a life dedicated to Christ according to people's own abilities.

Parish celebrates Msgr. Kovacic's birthday

Construction of the 7,000-square-foot facility began in 1991 and was completed in a record 12 weeks. The center was dedicated by then-Bishop John F. Donoghue on Feb. 16, 1992.

"It's appropriate that we rename this center in honor of Msgr. Kovacic," said Bishop Jugis, who recalled an early memory of the monsignor at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem.

The bishop was a young priest reporting to the church to serve as parochial vicar in 1984. Msgr. Kovacic, the bishop recalled, greeted him at the door with arms open wide, saying, "Welcome to St. Leo's."

"That image remains here," said Bishop Jugis. "This will remain a place where Christ welcomes all of us with open arms."

Cornerstone of service

Though Msgr. Kovacic is small in stature, "there's nothing small about the dedication and love he has shown the people of Queen of the Apostles, and continues to show day in and day out," said Oblate Father Joseph Zuschmidt, pastor.

"This gathering shows our love for you," he said to Msgr. Kovacic.

Msgr. Kovacic smiled as more applause erupted from the center adorned with photographs taken throughout his life.

Though he retired in 1994, Msgr. Kovacic still assists at Queen of the Apostles Church and other churches in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Hardly a Sunday goes by when he's not filling in for someone," said Carl Heil, a Queen of the Apostles parishioner who has known Msgr. Kovacic since 1997.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis listens as Msgr. Anthony Kovacic thanks those who attended his parish birthday celebration at Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont Jan. 9.

"He's always there to help," said Heil. "If he hears someone is in the hospital, sometimes he's there before the doctor."

Thomas Stocker III, 17, described Msgr. Kovacic as the "cornerstone of the church."

"He's tirelessly worked for us and the church, and shown us what a cornerstone he is," said Thomas. "For the youth, he is a wise person whom we can look up to. It's amazing one man can do so much."

"I am most grateful to Father Joe, the parish staff and all the parishioners for your goodness and kindness," said Msgr. Kovacic.

Mike Minnick recalled being an altar server for Msgr. Kovacic when he was pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte from 1973 until 1979.

"He's just infectious," said Minnick. "He's so positive and upbeat, never critical. He is very well loved."

Humble beginnings

Born in a humble stucco home cradled among the Alpine peaks of Slovenia, a former republic of Yugoslavia, on Jan. 11, 1920, Msgr. Kovacic first considered the priesthood at an early age.

"When I was five years old, the assistant pastor came to visit my home because my sister was very ill," said Msgr. Kovacic. "I, for the first time, expressed my intention or desire to become a priest."

He said his family began calling him "Zupnik," which means "pastor," "and I didn't mind," he said.

Msgr. Kovacic can still remember the German invasion of his country during World War II. "It was one of the saddest days of my life to see Hitler's divisions marching in and seeing flags everywhere with the swastika on them."

Slovenia was divided between Mussolini's Italian forces and Hitler's German troops. Msgr. Kovacic made several dangerous and unauthorized trips across the border to finish his schooling, with one trip almost costing his life.

"From the (guard) station somehow they noticed my movement toward the border," he said. "I heard some shooting, but I was not hit."

In October 1941, he entered the seminary in Ljubljana, Slovenia. A month later, he decided to finish his schooling at the seminary in Rome, where he met three priests who would become popes — John XXIII, Paul VI and Pius XII.

He was ordained in 1947 and came to the United States in July 1951. He began serving in the then-Diocese of Raleigh at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte that year. He was named a monsignor on Dec. 29, 1989.

Msgr. Kovacic has served in several parishes throughout the Diocese of Charlotte, and served as director of the diocese's permanent diaconate from its inception in 1980 until 1996.

In 1992, he was instrumental in helping to form a Knights of Columbus council at Queen of the Apostles Church. Presently, he retains the Office of Faithful Friar with the William Gaston Assembly No. 2531 and is director of the Propagation of the Faith.

In addition to helping out when needed in parishes, Msgr. Kovacic has used his spare time to work on his golf game.

"I'm one of the worst golfers, but I still love to play," he joked.

While cutting into his birthday cake, Msgr. Kovacic's eyes lit up as parishioners sang "Happy Birthday" to him.

"It wasn't always an easy life; it was often hard work," said Msgr. Kovacic. "But with God's blessing, I came through it."

Asheville librarian experiences life, schools in Japan

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — When school librarian Pamela Budd returned to Asheville Catholic School after a three-week visit to Japan, the students were eager to hear about her experiences.

Before she left, she promised to take "hundreds of photos" to "give the students a sense that Japan is a real place as opposed to a faraway place."

Budd was one of 600 educators selected to take part in a Fulbright Memorial Fund (FMF) Teaching Program, which allows distinguished primary and secondary educators in the United States to travel to Japan in an effort to promote greater intercultural understanding between the two nations.

Budd prepared for the trip by studying the Japanese language at a local community college and studying Japanese culture in her spare time.

In groups of 200, the educators visited Japan in June, October and November 2004. Budd and her group traveled in small groups to visit schools outside of Tokyo.

Budd visited four schools and discovered Japanese students are not much different from their American counterparts, except that they clean their schools.

"They do it joyfully," said Budd. "I saw one group of children cleaning the floor with rags, just scrubbing away."

Budd also learned that Japanese students put on slippers when they enter their schools. They have a separate pair of plastic slippers for the bathroom, which are kept outside the doors. If there are no slippers outside, the bathroom is full, so the students wait until someone comes out.

Japanese students also serve lunch, said Budd, and they do not wear uniforms until junior high. School runs from 8 a.m.-5 p.m., with after-school activities required as part of their curriculum.

Music is emphasized, and Budd found the school bands, even in elementary school, to be exemplary. One elementary school band played the U.S. national anthem to welcome her.

Martial arts and baseball are among the encouraged activities. The private high school in Nihara that Budd visited attracts many students due to its winning baseball team.

English study begins in seventh grade, Budd reported. Japanese students find the English alphabet, with its 26 letters, easy to learn compared with the Japanese language, which is comprised of thousands of characters.

During her visit to an elementary school in Mihara, Budd presented the third-grade class with a quilt made by third-graders at Asheville Catholic.

Budd said the highlight of her trip was the home visit, in which she spent a night with a Japanese family consisting of two parents, three children and two grandparents. Budd slept on a bed on the floor. The family's usual breakfast was rice, said Budd, but sometimes with grated radishes, eggs, seaweed soup, fish, green tea and tangerines.

Students in preschool, kindergarten and first- and second-grades began the show by singing contemporary Christmas carols. The program ended with third- through eighth-graders singing traditional carols.

Budd said she saw only one Christian church, an Episcopal church, during her visit in the country that is only 1 percent Christian. The church offered a service in English.

This month, the English teacher in Japan will arrange pen pals for the Asheville Catholic students. Budd will mostly work with the seventh-grade students, who are studying Japan.

Additionally, a koto player from Waynesville will perform the large stringed instrument for the students in February. An artist from Weaverville also will spend two days teaching Japanese language to students, who will write haikus in English and Japanese.

Another aspect of the FMF Teacher Program is for educators to share what they have learned in their communities through a variety of outreach programs. As such, Budd is scheduled to speak about her experiences to different groups at locations around the diocese.

The FMF program, sponsored by the Japanese government, was launched in 1997 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the U.S. government Fulbright Program, which has enabled more than 6,000 Japanese citizens to study in the United States on Fulbright fellowships for graduate education and research.

To date, more than 4,000 primary and secondary U.S. educators have visited Japan through the FMF program.

Teachers and administrators throughout the United States can apply to take part as guests of the Japanese government in one of three scheduled trips to Japan in 2005. Applicants are not required or expected to have prior knowledge of Japanese culture.

Prayer to obtain Grace and Mercy
Year of the Eucharist
2004-2005

Lord Jesus Christ, during this Year of the Eucharist, may our worship and contemplation of the mystery of your Body and Blood obtain for us an abundance of grace and mercy. May you, the High Priest of the New Covenant, raise up priests as ardent but gentle stewards of Your Mysteries to shepherd your faithful people. May you also inspire generous hearts to follow you, the Divine Shepherd, as religious sisters and brothers. Throughout our diocese strengthen our families with your grace. May Mary, Mother of God and patroness of our Diocese, assist us during this year as we contemplate Your face with her. May we offer the sacrifice of our lives in union with Your perfect sacrifice and so come to share in the eternal banquet, where you live with the Father and the Holy Spirit, one God forever and ever. Amen

O Sacrament most Holy
O Sacrament Divine:
All praise and all thanksgiving
Be every moment Thine!

Eucharistic prayer card to be distributed in parishes

CHARLOTTE — In correlation with the Year of Eucharist, proclaimed by Pope John Paul II to run from October 2004 until October 2005, the Diocese of Charlotte is issuing specially made prayer cards to all people of the Diocese of Charlotte.

The cards have been sent to all 92 parishes and missions in the diocese, and should be distributed soon, if not already, to parishioners.

The card, first announced in a letter from Bishop Peter J. Jugis in the Dec. 17 issue of The Catholic News & Herald, contains a photo of Raphael's "Disputation of the Eucharist" on one side and a "Prayer to Obtain Grace and Mercy" on the other side.

"It contains a special petition to Our Lord for more vocations to the priesthood and to the religious life to serve Him in the Diocese of Charlotte, and a petition for His blessing on all our families throughout the diocese," wrote Bishop Jugis.

"To celebrate this year of the Eucharist, I ask that you give primary importance to your participation each Sunday in the celebration of Mass at your local parish church," said the bishop.

Bishop Jugis also asked that persons consider spending time in eucharistic adoration outside of Mass. Several parishes throughout the Diocese of Charlotte offer regularly scheduled times each month for eucharistic exposition and Benediction. A listing of these parishes and times appears in the last issue of The Catholic News & Herald each month.

The list, as well as information about the upcoming diocesan Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Sept. 23-24, is available online at www.goeucharist.com.

Sacred ritual

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 3

Two weeks ago, we began our catechesis on the Mass by looking at the purpose or the goal of the Mass, which is to worship God as perfectly as possible and receive God's grace through the reception of Holy Communion.

Since this is our highest goal or duty in life, last week we acknowledged the need to prepare for Mass. We saw that the best preparation for Mass is to live a life of virtue, as well as taking time to pray before Mass begins.

This week we are going to take a moment to look at how we are to arrive at our goal. If our goal is to drive from Lincolnton to Washington, D.C., don't we take a moment to look over a road map? Today we will look at the road map, the schema of the Mass, commonly known as the "ritual."

Ritual is a natural part of human life. A good number of our daily activities are marked by ritual: from our morning rituals, to driving from place to place, to preparing supper and going to sleep at night. In fact, the philosophers have called man a "ritual-making animal."

Rituals mark the day, the week and the season. I'm sure most of us have a specific family ritual for the seasons and the feasts throughout the year, such as birthdays, Christmas and Easter.

The family of God also has its rituals. But the difference is that in God's family, He establishes the ritual that we are to follow. God is the author and the legislator of sacred ritual.

Indeed, if our goal is to worship God as perfectly as we are able, it would make sense that He would teach us how, even demonstrate the way it is to be done; it would make sense that He would provide us with an accurate road map that leads to Him. Otherwise, we might be wandering aimlessly about with no sense of our destination or the path.

Therefore, God has provided the Mass as a sacred ritual that we can follow to worship Him perfectly.

Not only does God establish the ritual of the Mass so that we can arrive safely at our destination, but He gives us the Mass because it is most suited to us as His children. When we are baptized, we become members of the body of Christ, adopted members of God's own family. And as members of his family, we worship Him as a family, as a community of faith.

Ritual allows communal expression of faith that spans time and place, culture and language. It is one of the marks or

Guest Column

FATHER
BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

characteristics of the Catholic Church that we share a universal faith and practice with all Catholics throughout the world. The Mass that we attend today is the same Mass that is being offered in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome by the Pope.

So, when you are on vacation in Italy or England or Australia, you can attend the same Catholic Mass that is being offered in Lincolnton. Ritual allows communal expression of faith throughout the world and throughout time.

Perhaps more importantly than allowing communal expression of faith, ritual also encourages true freedom. Many people think that ritual binds or constricts or stifles freedom of expression. But in reality, ritual encourages freedom.

The modern mind misunderstands freedom. The modern mind often confuses freedom with liberty or license. Just imagine a communal worship service that did not follow a ritual. How free would the congregation be to participate? Would you know what to expect next?

When it comes to driving, the rules of the road encourage the freedom of drivers to arrive safely at their destination. It is when a driver decides to be novel or innovative in their approach to the speed limit or other such rules that accidents occur. Like the rules of driving, ritual establishes a familiar pattern. This familiar pattern of worship allows free access to the sacred mysteries.

Ritual is like the two banks of a river that direct the flow of that river towards its destination. Ritual frees the mind and the heart to respond to God's grace and allows us to pray more effectively.

Next week, we will conclude our background material on the Mass by looking at how our Lord established the sacred ritual of the Mass within the context of another sacred ritual: the Passover.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Basilica restoration uncovers pre-Civil War balcony for freed slaves

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Restoration work on Baltimore's basilica has uncovered the original balcony in the rear of the 198-year-old building where freed slaves were allowed to worship before the Civil War.

"It's a significant discovery," said Mark J. Potter, executive director of the Basilica of the Assumption Historic Trust.

The 40-foot-long balcony provided black worshippers with the best view of the sanctuary, even though they were segregated from the rest of the congregation, said restoration architect John G. Waite, an expert on the history of the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

And, he said, while all the old cathedral's pews were rented to worshippers, the ones in the balcony were free to their black occupants.

"When you consider how the balcony was used it was actually a very progressive thing to do in those days because other churches weren't letting blacks through their doors in the first place," Waite said.

Shortly after the Civil War, the balcony was restructured and transformed into two small balconies. Blacks, now emancipated, were then deprived of their place in the basilica, Waite said.

Ironically, the changes were made by John Rudolph Niernsee, an important architect of 19th-century buildings.

Waite said he suspects that Niernsee's strong Southern sympathies were behind the move to redo the balcony and oust blacks from the cathedral.

The head of the Baltimore see at the time was Archbishop Martin John Spalding, a Southerner. However, the balcony issue becomes more mysterious in light of the fact that that Archbishop Restoration work on the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Baltimore has uncovered this original balcony where freed slaves were allowed to worship before the Civil War.

Spalding had not only been a strong supporter of emancipation but had made considerable efforts to evangelize blacks and assure their fair treatment after the Civil War.

Whatever the reasons behind the changing of the balcony may have been, it will now be fully restored to its original condition.

Meanwhile, Potter said that while construction workers are operating on a tight schedule he is confident the restoration will be completed in September 2006, in time for the basilica's November bicentennial celebrations.

Annual event to celebrate legacy of Rev. King

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — People in the Diocese of Charlotte will soon have an opportunity to experience a celebration of diversity and unity.

The Annual Martin Luther King Jr. Celebration, sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry, will be held at the Hilton-University Place Hotel in Charlotte on Saturday, Jan. 22.

In order to encourage greater and more diverse attendance, the celebration has been moved from its previous location at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte and is being held after Martin Luther King Jr. Day.

"There are typically many related events taking place that weekend, so we wanted to give all the opportunity to participate in ours," said Deacon Curtiss Todd, vice chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte and vicar of the African American Affairs Ministry.

The format has also changed. In years past, the daylong celebration consisted primarily of workshops and liturgy. This year, the event will feature a prayer breakfast, a tour of the Levine Museum of the New South, lunch and an afternoon of black gospel music including genres from slavery to the present.

Featured performers include an old-fashioned hymn choir, an a cappella choir, an instrumental gospel group and the Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir from Our Lady of Consolation Church.

"While this year's celebration is not focusing specifically on the life, legacy, teachings and inspiration of Dr. King, the African American Affairs Ministry still feels that this format helps bridge the divisions that unfortunately still exist between races and religions and keeps Dr. King's dream alive," said Deacon Todd.

The registration deadline of Jan. 10 has been extended.

"To afford everyone an opportunity to attend, registration is still going on," said Deacon Todd.

WANT TO GO?

Registration is $10, which includes all activities, breakfast and lunch, and transportation to and from the museum. To register or for more information, call (704) 370-3339.

Morning-after pill does not decrease pregnancies

Pro-Life Activities.

"Proponents have repeatedly claimed that making the drug available without a prescription would reduce abortion numbers by as many as half; now their own study debunks that claim," said Ruse.

The study, which appears in the Jan. 5 Journal of the American Medical Association, was conducted at the University of California at San Francisco and studied 2,117 women ages 15-24 for six months.

For the study, the young women were divided into three groups. One group was given a supply of the pills, another group was told to obtain them from a pharmacy and the third group was told to get the drugs from a local health clinic. Women in all three groups had pregnancy rates of around 8 percent.

In each group, including those who had the personal supply of the pills, many of the women did not even use them.

Barr Pharmaceuticals Laboratories, which makes the Plan B pills, has requested that the Food and Drug Administration make the drugs available over the counter without a prescription.

The FDA turned down the initial application last year, saying there was not enough information on how the drug's accessibility would affect the sexual activity of teenagers. The University of California researchers found that the drug's availability did not cause an increase in risky sexual behavior.

A spokeswoman for Barr Pharmaceuticals told reporters Jan. 5 that the drug company has resubmitted its proposal for over-the-counter availability and expects a response from the FDA later in January.

Ruse, in a Jan. 5 statement, described Plan B as "essentially an overdose of prescription birth-control pills." She said it is "marketed and advertised as a contraceptive" but that "its own proponents admit that it works before and after conception."

She also noted that studies in New Zealand and the United Kingdom "show the drug is associated with an increased risk of ectopic pregnancy, a potentially fatal complication."

"Our message to the FDA remains the same: putting Plan B on the drug-store shelf is bad policy and bad medicine," said Ruse.

"Besides being 'bad policy and bad medicine,' the morning-after pill sends a message that actions have no consequences," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life Office. "The drug company is marketing the idea that a pill is available to solve any problem one may be facing."

Head of Priests for Life honored for his pro-life work

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BUFFALO, N.Y. — Father Frank A. Pavone, director of Priests for Life, was honored for his dedication to the pro-life cause by the Association for the Arch of Triumph of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and International Shrine of the Holy Innocents.

Headed by New York attorney Laurence Behr, the Catholic lay association in Buffalo wants to erect a 700-foot-tall ascendable arch, along with a shrine dedicated to victims of abortion around the world.

At a recent banquet, Behr presented Father Pavone with an award in recognition of his "selfless, courageous and persevering advocacy on behalf of the weakest and most vulnerable members of society — the unborn, the sick and the elderly."

In his address, Father Pavone responded to claims that before the Nov. 2 presidential election his nonprofit organization engaged in political activity by sending priests to churches and parish centers to talk about abortion. The pro-life group also organized conference calls aimed at getting out the vote and helped elderly voters get to the polls.

"I continue to be amazed that some people seem to think it is inappropriate for the church to speak up against baby-killing — dismembering a child," Father Pavone said.

"Something is very wrong when one's loyalty to a political party is greater than one's loyalty to God and fundamental human rights," the priest said.

"We still have the freedom of expression in this country and the best way to protect it is to exercise it without fear. We have the right to speak up against injustice, no matter whom we offend," the priest added.

Father Pavone added that "we have a message that goes far beyond any political party — we have a message that is eternal and reaches from one end of the universe to the other: that every human life is a manifestation of the glory of God, and that an attack on any human life is an attack on God himself."

Father Frank Pavone, founding director of Priests for Life, prays with a group of pro-life supporters outside an abortion clinic in Louisville, Ky. More than 150 supporters from Indiana and Kentucky attended the prayer vigil.

The priest said he supports the proposed Arch of Triumph and shrine, saying it will get the attention of those who find it "easy to ignore" the pro-life message.

Behr said his organization has seen the number of supporters of the arch and shrine project increase in the United States, Canada and other countries.

He said the structures will promote an awareness of and devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary, which he said will lead people closer to Christ and bring an end to abortion.

Encouraging prayer

Priest compiles devotional prayers aimed at helping people's faith

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

SAN FRANCISCO — Father Benedict Groeschel, a Franciscan Friar of the Renewal who was injured in a near-fatal accident earlier this year, recently completed a compilation of devotional prayers called "Praying to Our Lord Jesus Christ: Prayers and Meditations Through the Centuries."

The 156-page book is illustrated with images of classic art and includes prayers from early church fathers, medieval theologians and modern-day saints.

Father Groeschel, in the book's introduction, said the collection of prayers was "written under rather difficult circumstances" due to his hospitalization.

But he added that he wanted to "bring out a small book of prayers to Christ in order to encourage every Catholic, every Christian, to pray devoutly and fervently every day to Christ."

"At this time in the church," he wrote, "it seems to me that we need to bring back devotion, especially devotion to Jesus Christ."

He said the prayers are not simply meant to be read, but intended for meditation and personal prayer.

"How rewarding it is to meditate on beautiful prayers so that our own prayers may become more meaningful," he added.

Father Groeschel, the 71-year-old priest who is internationally known for his retreat work and appearances on Mother Angelica's EWTN cable network, has kept up with writing, by dictation, and has edited several books during his recovery.

He was severely injured after he was hit by a car while walking across a Florida intersection Jan. 11, 2004.

Some of his other books include "The Rosary: Chain of Hope," "Arise From Darkness," "A Still Small Voice" and "The Reform of Renewal."

The adventure of a lifetime

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Each year we receive Christmas letters that reflect the ebb and flow in the lives of relatives and friends who have scattered across the country. Sometimes the Christmas letters arrive the day after Thanksgiving; sometimes they trickle in near the middle of January. Nevertheless, these missives signal the gift of life and have the power to evoke memories of days long gone.

Closing one of these letters from a friend I met over 30 years ago, I began to reminisce about some of the outrageously fun times we had when we lived in a small West Texas town. Rich memories washed over me as I looked at her handwriting on the envelope.

I remembered the day she sat down next to me in church one Sunday morning, radiant as a sunbeam. Before I knew what hit me, I was going to help her run the Brownie Scout summer day camp which met in a generous rancher's pasture a few miles out of town.

The hot dusty days of preparation, a swarm of energized Brownie Scouts, an occasional cow and the relentless West Texas sun cemented a friendship that has lasted more than 30 years, even though 200 miles now separate us.

In this week's Gospel reading, we hear Matthew's familiar account of how Jesus began to choose the men we have come to know as apostles, saints or members of the Twelve. However, in the beginning the first four chosen were hardworking fishermen on the Sea of Galilee. Perhaps we wonder along with Zebedee, the father of James and John, how these men could drop nets, abandon boats and go traipsing after an itinerant teacher.

Although Scripture does not tell us, a number of scholars theorize that Jesus and these men were probably not total strangers the day Jesus invited them to leave everything and to embark on the adventure of a lifetime.

What person on the shore, that day so long ago, could have predicted that 2,000 years later people around the globe would remember these fishermen and ponder the consequences of following Jesus?

Perhaps we are like the fishermen that day on the beach. We may know who Jesus is, but we have not left everything and joined him for the adventure of a lifetime.

Questions:

If Jesus called you to "drop your nets" and follow him, would you go? What would it take to get you to follow him more closely in the daily life you live right now?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"He called (James and John), and immediately they abandoned boat and father to follow him" (Matthew 4:22).

Something to sing about

Catholic artist's 'Hymns' come from childhood

BY T. JENSEN LACEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Singer-songwriter Beth Nielsen Chapman has penned songs for singers such as Faith Hill, Willie Nelson, Bonnie Raitt and Trisha Yearwood, while also producing contemporary pop hits under her own name.

But her latest CD release titled "Hymns" has caused the music world to sit up and take notice.

"When I sing, I generally like to get out of the way of the song, to serve the song, and not my personality as a vocalist," Chapman said.

"This was particularly important to me in performing these beautiful hymns in Latin," she added. "There's a powerful vibration and clarity in the tones of the vowels and the melodies, and harmonies have a way of reaching through to the heart all by themselves."

Chapman said she is "all over the map" when it comes to genres, since she has written and sung pop, country, folk and blues.

"I was raised in a military family and I was exposed to a lot of other cultures," she said, "and that's kind of blended into my musicality."

Another thing that has influenced her CD "Hymns" is her Catholic upbringing. Chapman attends a number of churches in the Nashville area, often singing at St. Edward's Catholic Church when she's not traveling, and was raised Catholic.

She spoke about how the CD came about: "I had been working on a project called 'World Hymns,' which is a collection of hymns from different paths of faith, each one in a different language, from the root of each religion. I had completed one in Sanskrit, one in Tibetan, a Shaker hymn, a Negro spiritual, and several others.

"As I was preparing to choose one of the many gorgeous Catholic hymns I grew up singing as a child, I was stunned to discover that I couldn't find a recorded collection of them anywhere," she added. "I decided it was a sign that I should record these songs from my root religion as a starting place."

Chapman recalled "standing between my parents and singing 'along, up close and personal," and said she decided that, "if nothing else, I would do a collection of my favorites for my mom and dad."

But she found a much wider audience for the collection of hymns.

After National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" show recently featured the CD, "there was this amazing response," Chapman reported.

"Within two days I had nearly 6,000 records ordered," she said. "Amazon.com had it listed as No. 3 on their sales chart, and on my Web page I've had so many e-mails from people from many religions, especially Catholics, who had such an emotional reaction to it."

"One e-mail came from someone who had once been an altar boy and (said he) could smell the incense within the first few bars of the song," she said.

A 'Love Song' barely worth singing

Scarlett Johansson and John Travolta star in "A Love Song for Bobby Long," a lazily paced drama about a wayward teen-ager (Johansson) who moves in with a drunkard (Travolta) haunted by past sins, and his young protege, both of whom reform their broken lives to help her reclaim her future. An uneven film weighed down by Southern schmaltz, but imparts a redemptive message about family and forgiveness. Alcohol abuse and recurring rough and sexually crude language and humor, as well as some profanity. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

"He wrote he felt a connection to God for the first time in 49 years and that it brought back the mystery and beauty of the Mass from a simpler time."

Chapman's 23-year-old son, Ernest Chapman, sang the tenor parts on the CD, and her father, Robert Nielsen, sang bass on her rendition of Mozart's "Ave Verum Corpus."

The 48-year-old artist said the songs she has written have been "like a chronicle of my life experiences."

"Writing my way through sometimes has been the only way to heal, as well as a way to express the good times," Chapman said. "The death of my husband to cancer in 1994 was a huge turning point in my life, and in the midst of that sorrow there have been gifts in going forward and deepening as a person."

"I wrote the song, 'Hymn to Mary,' which is the only song on the CD that is an original song," she said. "I felt abandoned by God, which was very unusual for me ... but writing that hymn took me to a place where Mary was, and always is waiting to help, and that helped me feel connected again."

CSS gets inquiries for adopting tsunami orphans

“Because we do have a reputation as an international adoption agency, we have received calls from people with concerns about the orphans of the tsunami,” said Elizabeth Thurbee, executive director of Catholic Social Services in Charlotte.

“As happens frequently when disasters happen — whether they be natural disasters or wars — and children are left abandoned, good-hearted people have concern for those children in need,” she said.

However, said Thurbee, adopting orphans from the countries affected by the earthquake and tsunamis will not be likely.

“I think the thing to be kept in mind, especially with these children, is that it will be many months before the countries can determine whether or not the parents are still alive, whether there are other family members who are still alive,” said Thurbee, “so the first effort to minister to the needs of these children will be to locate any family that they may have and to reunite them with that family.”

If it is determined that children are orphans, said Thurbee, the governments will see if there are any families within their own cultures who can take care of them.

“We certainly feel very positive about international adoption, but it is a resource available for children who have not been able to be placed with loving families within their own cultures,” said Thurbee. “Therefore, it is made available for those children because all of those other avenues have already been exhausted.”

If a country is considering allowing international adoption, said Thurbee, “one of the first groups to whom they will look to provide that would be reputable and certified agencies that already have a presence in that particular part of the world.”

However, she said, “some of the countries that are hardest hit are countries that do not have a history of international adoption and have no legal vehicle to allow that to happen.”

Protecting the victims

With attention now focused on aiding survivors, refugee assistance organizations are concerned about protecting vulnerable populations of people, including millions who had been displaced from their homes since long before December, as well as orphaned children.

In early January, amid reports of a surge in trafficking in children for slavery, governments in the tsunami-affected countries said they were taking steps to prevent the kidnapping of children who were orphaned or separated from their families.

Anastasia Brown, director of refugee programs for Migration and Refugee Services (MRS) of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the Catholic Migration Commission staff in Indonesia was focusing on how to protect children who are vulnerable to traffickers.

“Catholic Social Services, as a part of the diocesan response, is encouraging people to donate funds to the tsunami relief,” said Thurbee. “Any funds donated to Catholic Social Services, the parishes or the diocese will go to Catholic Relief Services.”

“We would encourage people to give to reputable charities that have programs in Asia,” she said.

Displaced before December

While Brown was thrilled there has been “such a terrific response to the tsunami” disaster, she noted that the countries hardest hit by the tsunamis — Thailand, Indonesia, Sri Lanka and India — were providing refuge already to several million refugees.

According to the most recent report of the U.S. Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, many people living in “temporary” refugee or displacement camps had been there for more than five years.

Besides causing the deaths of at least 150,000 people in 11 countries, the earthquake and tsunamis obliterated the homes of hundreds of thousands more, and destroyed the sources of employment for many.

The number of new orphans after the tsunamis “pales in comparison” to the number of children with no known relatives who are living in the world’s refugee camps, said Mark Franken, director of MRS.

Prior to the tsunamis, MRS had begun working with the U.S. government in an effort to provide permanent solutions for unaccompanied minors, he said.

The distance between the United States and the tsunami-affected areas makes it unlikely that survivors of the disaster will either attempt or be able to seek permanent refuge in the United States any time soon, migration experts said.

“Adoption is difficult anyway, because children lose their biological heritage,” said Thurbee. “If they also come out of the country and the culture that produced them, then they’ve lost their culture as well.”

“Our task would be to help those children remain in their own country and work to improve the standard of living in that country so that their lives would be better,” she said.

Tsunami by another name

Humans have been taken away before

What if the tsunamis that hit South and Southeast Asia recently had happened in slow motion, flinging people as far away as our own backyards? What if that slow-motion event spread out over a number of years, allowing us to see those hands reaching out to us in desperation, hear those cries for help or see heads hung low in abject misery?

What would the world do then?

To my way of thinking, a tsunami of this sort has already happened, only it goes by another name: the slave trade that brought countless Africans to America in bondage centuries ago.

Like a giant wave, slave catchers descended upon unsuspecting men, women and youths, sweeping them away to foreign lands to a kind of living death bereft of love and family. Victims weren't pinned down by any resulting wreckage of buildings or trees; they were confined by chains and kept subservient by whips and threats of torture and heinous murder, by fear and shattered dreams.

Those who bore children knew that no amount of tears and pleading would spare their offspring from being sold "down river" if the price was right.

Like today's tsunami victims, always in their lives was water in its back-and-forth motion of giving — for drinking, bathing, relief in the baking sun — and taking away.

By the grace of God, countless descendants of the victims of the slave-trade tsunamis are alive today and still desirous of water that will nurture their lives. This is the water of education that can carry them out of ignorance and poverty to a higher ground where self-sufficiency allows them to be better citizens.

While there are those who don't see the need for Herculean efforts to save people still drowning figuratively, there are others who, thank God, disagree.

Recently the TV show "Religion and Ethics Newsweekly" presented a segment about philanthropist George Weiss who has given $34 million to encourage poor, minority children to stay in school and go to college. He has teamed up with the University of Pennsylvania to facilitate his "Say Yes to

Bridging Gaps

CAROLE NORRIS GREENE

Education" project.

The hundreds of kindergarteners selected to participate in Weiss' program "would not only get a free college education, but tutoring along the way, free summer schools, college financial aid for their siblings, even free legal services and continuing education for their parents," the report said.

Is Weiss giving too much? Or is the problem just so great that even more is needed?

Weiss has pledged another $20 million to his project. He encourages others to contribute as well at www.sayyestoeducation.org.

In contrast, when the University of Georgia said it is considering a policy change that, if adopted, would allow it to use a student's race or ethnicity and other considerations apart from one's grade-point average to determine admissions, some of its students disagreed. They felt admissions should be "strictly merit-based."

What about the merit that comes with having achieved the status of being human, of having unduly suffered tremendous loss and being in need?

I applaud the wonderful outpouring of resources and heartfelt prayers for the victims of the Asian tsunamis whose devastations did not occur in slow motion. They hit at a rate of 500 miles per hour. Now every minute counts in the saving of lives!

I suspect that many of those naysayers of affirmative action and similar efforts to even the playing field for the descendants of the slave-trade tsunamis are among the most generous of these supporters.

The task that remains is to recognize a tsunami in all its hideous forms.

Pope says despite events Christians believe good will triumph

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Although life is complicated and worrying events continue to take place, Christians believe that God rules history and that good will triumph in the end, Pope John Paul II said.

From God the Father, Christ "has received royal power over the whole universe; in him the salvation, strength and kingdom of our God are completed," the pope said at his Jan. 12 general audience.

After the Christmas and New Year's festivities, the pope returned to his series of audience talks about psalms and canticles used in the church's evening prayer.

Looking at a hymn of joy and gratitude for God's saving power taken from the Book of Revelation, the pope said that while it tells of the judgment day it emphasizes God's desire to save all creation.

The hymns found in Revelation, he said, "have the function of illustrating the theme of the divine lordship that rules over the often troubling flux of human events."

The Pope Speaks

God's judgment at the end of time not only will mark the final defeat of evil, but also will raise up and reward the just ones, the pope said.

"These are the 'servants' who adhere to divine law with fidelity; the 'prophets' entrusted with the revealed word, who interpret and judge history; the 'saints,' who are consecrated to God and respect his name, ready to adore him and obey his will," he said.

The heavenly hosts rejoice in the Book of Revelation, the pope said, because they know that "Satan, the ancient enemy," has no more power over humanity.

Prayers of petition

We cannot command God, only accept his will

Recently I read a letter to the editor expressing annoyance at a news story in the Catholic press. He chided teachers for encouraging their grammar school students to celebrate because the soldier for whom they had been praying returned home safely from the Iraq War.

He wrote: "Isn't it time that we put such notions to rest once and for all — a God who micromanages the universe, pulling strings like a puppeteer? A God with whom prayer sometimes works and sometimes doesn't work."

He went on: "Life is full of random, often opposing forces, and that all living creatures, including humans, get hurt, badly, even die — planes fall out of the sky, cancer invades an organ, babies die in the womb, bullets and bombs kill soldiers."

"None of this is orchestrated by a God-in-the-sky, and none of it is prevented in answer to prayer. Prayer doesn't change anything outside of ourselves."

The Lord Jesus taught a much different theology:

"Ask, and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives; and he who seeks finds; and to him who knocks it will be opened. What man is there among you who, if his son asks for bread will give him a stone? Or if he asks for a fish, will he give him a serpent? If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your heavenly Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask him!" (Mt 7:7-11)

When some prayers are not answered the way one would like, a true believer turns to the words of Jesus. He taught us to include in our petition the phrase "Thy will be done."

These are the words that he used during his agony in the Garden: "Not my will, but thine be done."

We cannot command God to obey us. We can only accept in faith what he sends, even if we do not fully understand it. For some there will be joy, for others disappointment.

St. Paul taught us to "rejoice with those who rejoice and weep with those who weep. Live in harmony with one another. Do not consider yourself to be wiser than you are" (Rom 12:15).

If you believe that Jesus is a divine person and that his words are true, then you have made the leap of faith. Be at peace. God does answer our prayers.

Abortion and Child Abuse — Part 2

Abused children likely to abort their children

Editor's note: Part 1 of Father Pavone's column appeared in the Dec. 3 issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

In my previous column, I have pointed out that there is a mutual causality between abortion and child abuse. While this does not mean that everyone who was abused has an abortion, or that everyone who has an abortion will abuse their children, it does mean that there is significant correlation and influence both ways.

I have already looked at some reasons why having an abortion can lead to the abuse of other children. Here I will comment on why being abused or neglected as a child increases the likelihood that one will abort her own child.

The person who is abused or neglected as a child is deeply damaged, and the damage extends into adulthood. Because the damage is done in key areas of how one sees oneself, how one trusts others, how one views the parent-child relationship and what expectations one has about the world and the future, this damage obviously affects both the willingness and ability to give birth to and raise a child.

Guest Column

FATHER
FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Life and hope are inextricably linked. To have the courage to say yes to new life requires hope, and hope is one of the most precious things that abuse and neglect destroy in their victims. If the hopes and dreams of the abused person are dashed, they see little hope for the future of their child, and hence abort that child.

Moreover, abuse and neglect make the person weaker both in body and mind. The abuse victim finds it harder to trust her body to bear stress or pain, and finds it harder to engage in mature and flexible thinking. For these reasons, she will often say that a pregnancy is "too much to go through."

Abortion seems like the easier option.

Fear of abandonment is another major factor. Children who have been neglected or abandoned are terrified it will happen again. Hence, a pregnant abuse victim is especially vulnerable to threats of abandonment from those demanding she abort. She may also fear that the child will abandon her, and would prefer to abort than to face that kind of abandonment.

A related problem is the parental relationship. A woman who was abused or neglected by her parents in childhood is not going to think that they will be present and supportive during her pregnancy. When she desperately needed help as a child, her parents did not help; hence, she is convinced they will not help now. This increases the temptation to abort.

Pregnancy and childbirth, moreover, catapult a person into the demands of adulthood. One who has been abused or neglected has, essentially, missed out on her childhood, and seeks to cling to or recover it. This increases the unwillingness to lose that childhood in yet another way, that is, by accepting the maturity demanded by parenthood. This is seen as losing one's last chance of being nurtured by a parent.

Keeping faith

TRUST FOSTERS HEALTHY SPIRIT, GIVES LIVES MEANING

"As I get older, I find it more and more difficult to keep my faith. All my childhood beliefs are being shattered."

Those comments of a friend are being echoed more frequently by many others. They feel that people and institutions they trusted are not living up to their word.

Much has happened recently to shake our faith. Sex abuse scandals have led some to leave the church. The reason for going to war with Iraq was based on intelligence reports that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction; to date, this has not been proven true.

Questions are being raised about the accomplishments of some athletes — whether these are true accomplishments at all. And many once-respected CEOs have turned out to be frauds whose dealings harmed a great many people.

To make matters worse, we have seen a proliferation of books and documentaries questioning the veracity of Scripture.

How do we keep our faith in the midst of all this?

First, remember that faith doesn't remain static. It experiences ups and downs. Take for example marriage, in which couples pledge undying faith in each other. As they live together day in and day out, patience, trust and love may be tested, but for many it will be restored.

When we look deeper, we discover another rule of faith: Love is the driving force behind faith. Often we hear spouses say, "He [she] can't always be counted on, but I still love him [her]." They take the weaknesses with the strengths for reasons based in love.

Almost everything one deeply believes in will get tested by disappointments. These hurts and anger force us to realize the critical role love plays in faith.

Furthermore, we experience this pain because we relish trust, which fulfills our desire to be at one with others. This gives our lives meaning; it is healthy for our spirit.

Another rule of faith: Don't allow a broken trust to deteriorate into a divorce from an institution or a person! Becoming isolated, separated and withdrawn are bad for the spirit.

When we break relations, our affections wither and we end up carrying a heavy chip on our shoulders. We literally put ourselves at risk of becoming spiritually, psychologically and physically ugly.

One final rule: Faith, like life, requires a series of "patching-ups" and commitments. When it seems that faith is being tested or threatened, this rule counsels us:

Let life begin anew, and start by working on your own spirit, which relies on faith and love as its fuel.

It's not broken, don't fix it

Social Security's future depends on us

After multiple sclerosis crippled my father and made him quit work, the family drew Social Security Disability Insurance. Some years later, my father joked about how the government finally cured him. He showed me a letter he got from the Social Security Administration that read, "Dear Mr. Rausch, with your 65th birthday, you are no longer disabled. You are retired."

But, his retirement lasted only 15 days. Two weeks after his birthday, he suffered a heart attack and died. With that, his check came to my 69-year old widowed mother.

Social Security arrived when I was 11 and my sisters were teen-agers. It gave my family stability when it faced the crisis of my father's illness, and afforded my mother dignity in her senior years. Today, more than 47 million benefit from Social Security, the Old Age Survivors and Disability Insurance program, many of whom reflect my own family's history.

In 2004, the Social Security Administration crunched the numbers and targeted 2042 as the year the trust fund would hit zero balance. Political opportunists seized the projections to promote their own agenda — privatization. For people of faith, the current alleged crisis pits the ideology of rugged individualism (neo-liberalism) against the concept of community proclaimed by the social teachings of the church.

Consider these ideas for the current debate:

— Social Security appears as strong as ever. In 1996, Social Security's trustees projected a zero fund balance by 2030. In 2000, they adjusted the projection to 2036, and today it's 2042. Projections keep changing because the trustees continue to make unrealistic, low-end assumptions about future economic conditions, like a GDP average growth of just 1.8 percent for the next 75 years.

If the economy grows at a more realistic 2.4 percent annual rate, the increase in real output and real incomes will insure the trust fund never going to zero. The opportunists have hysterically changed public policy from "keep an eye on it" to "the sky is falling."

— Privatization will transform Social Security from insurance to risk taking. By investing part of their Social Security money in private accounts, younger workers are enticed by promises of better returns at retirement. Current wisdom: investors do far worse than the market generally. Retirement money will fluctuate with poor investing or a declining market. Privatization threatens communal justice by changing "we're all in this together," to "every man for himself."

— Finally, privatization will produce great profits for banks and brokerage houses, but reduced benefits for Social Security beneficiaries. To track the proposed millions of private accounts, administrative costs that cut into benefits will rise tenfold, if handled by a single government-managed system, and possibly thirty-fold, if by private financial institutions.

Currently, Social Security administrative costs represent less than 0.6 per-

Faith and the Marketplace

GLENMARY
FATHER JOHN

cent of annual benefits.

The debate about privatization can find economists with numbers to support either side. Yet, neither side can deny critical decision-making time remains decades away. Meantime, merely mid-course corrections and slight policy adjustments of Social Security "can keep an eye on it."

Preserving Social Security represents the safety net that has lifted 1 million children out of poverty and helped another million avoid extreme poverty (living below half the poverty line). Today, about 10 percent of seniors over age 65 live in poverty. Without Social Security, that rate would climb to 50 percent.

The proponents of privatization are framing an important question: what kind of society do we want to create — one based on exaggerated self-reliance, or a community of care encouraged by the Gospel?

Since its founding in 1965, Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont has served as the hub of spiritual life for many Gaston County Catholics, as well as an outreach center for many in the community.

BELMONT — Under the shadow of the seat of the Diocese of Charlotte and Belmont Abbey, Queen of the Apostles Church has provided a spiritual home for Gaston County Catholics since its dedication in March 1965. Although the parish community is relatively small in size, Queen of the Apostles Church's parish boundaries cover a large part of Gaston County, extending into western Mecklenburg County.

While Queen of the Apostles Church was founded as a parish of the diocese rather than that of Belmont Abbey — which to this day falls under no diocesan jurisdiction — its parishioners thank the Benedictines for their assistance in indirectly establishing the parish.

The abbey cathedral was the only active church for Belmont-area Catholics until 1965, when plans to establish a diocesan parish came to fruition. Named Queen of the Apostles Church, the church was the converted gymnasium of a boarding school for boys, while an addition was built to include a sacristy, rectory and office.

Shortly after the church's establishment, Queen of Apostles parishioners were given a duty of significant historical value: custodial care of the Church of Sts. Joseph and Mary in nearby Mount Holly. Although liturgical activities had been suspended in the small church in the late 1800s, St. Joseph was restored in the mid-1970s under the direction of then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of the recently created Diocese of Charlotte.

Today St. Joseph Church is used for special occasions such as the feast of St. Joseph. The U.S. Department of the Interior and the State of North Carolina declared the church a national historical site in 1979.

In 1991, then-Bishop John F. Donoghue granted permission for construction on a parish center for Queen of the Apostles Church. The two new buildings — a parish family center and a classroom center — were dedicated in February 1992.

Queen of the Apostles Church has been blessed with many dedicated pastors over the years, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis, Msgr. Anthony Kovacic, Father Richard Hokanson, Father Edward Malloy, Msgr. John McSweeney and Msgr. Thomas Burke.

Oblate Father Joseph Zuschmidt has served as pastor since May 1, 2003. He is continually impressed with the commitment, enthusiasm and hospitality of his parishioners.

Outreach being a continuing effort of the parish, Queen of the Apostles Church stands as a testimony of the enterprising evangelical spirit of Catholicism in North Carolina's history and its present. Ecumenical bonds are maintained through such efforts as the Gaston County Nutritional Program, which uses the parish's family center to provide and deliver meals to those in need. Parishioners distribute food to the needy of Belmont from the church's food pantry as well.

The church also maintains active ties with the Belmont Community Organization, which offers help to the needy in Belmont by providing clothing and financial assistance for utilities, medicine and food.

The parish displays a keen sense of outreach to the organization operated by the Sisters of Mercy, including volunteer work at Catherine's House, Holy Angels and House of Mercy.

Another ecumenical program initiated by Queen of the Apostles Church is the interfaith prayer for peace service, where people of all faith meet at a different house of worship in Gaston County each month to share their experiences and pray for peace.

Along with normal parish activities, such as adult faith formation and Bible sharing, Queen of the Apostles Church has a parish nurse who works with other churches in the Belmont area.

The parish continues to maintain its historical ties with Belmont Abbey through periodic assistance from the Benedictine monks for reconciliation services and weekend liturgical activities when the pastor is unavailable.

A chapel for perpetual adoration of the Eucharist, located on the abbey grounds, was established by former pastor Msgr. Thomas Burke. Members of the college community join parishioners of Queen of the Apostles Church in daily adoration.

On Jan. 9, Bishop Jugis rededicated the church's parish life center in honor of Msgr. Kovacic, in recognition of his nine years as pastor of Queen of the Apostles Church. The day's events also celebrated Msgr. Kovacic's 85th birthday.

"Msgr. Kovacic is a beloved shepherd and friend to the parish of Queen of Apostles," said Father Zuschmidt. "In honor of the occasion of his birthday, we are rededicating the center to him, since he built it."

"Queen of the Apostles Church is also in the shadows of the abbey and the Sisters of Mercy," said Father Zuschmidt. "While proud of our connections to all of them, we are also proud to be a viable parish in our own right, fully equipped and able to minister to the Catholics of Belmont, Mount Holly and beyond."

Staff Writer Karen A. Evans contributed to this story.

CHARLOTTE — Every day, in every corner of the Diocese of Charlotte, people serve as the hands of Christ.

A family adopting children from China. A parish reaching out to welcome Hispanics into the fold. A young man studying for the priesthood so he can serve God and others.

Through your support of the Diocesan Support Appeal, these are just a few examples of how people in the Diocese of Charlotte serve as "the hands of Christ."

"As good and grateful stewards of God's many gifts, we are called to share what we have with others," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in a January letter announcing the 2005 Diocesan Support Appeal, themed "We are the hands of Christ," which runs Jan. 30-March 15.

The president of The Catholic University of America, Vincentian Father David M. O'Connell, listens as U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney delivers remarks on Social Security Jan. 13 in Washington.

Cheney backs Social Security changes in speech at Catholic University

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Vice President Dick Cheney told an audience at The Catholic University of America in Washington Jan. 13 that the administration's plan to change Social Security could yield greater retirement benefits for those who invest in the stock market.

Two days after President George W. Bush launched a campaign to fundamentally change the Social Security program with the claim that the system is headed toward bankruptcy, Cheney reiterated many of the president's points and disputed critics of the proposals.

For example, Cheney said the answer to concerns about the financial risks posed by workers withdrawing from Social Security in favor of personal investment accounts "is simply to set guidelines, basic standards of safety and soundness when it comes to investment choices."

Cheney said investment in the stock market can yield more substantial savings than a worker could earn through Social Security, and called securities markets "the best, safest way to build substantial personal savings."

"The charge has also been made that President Bush wants to push everyone into personal accounts," Cheney said. Personal accounts would be "a voluntary option," he said.

"Much of it comes down to a matter of trust — whether a citizen would prefer to rely on the federal government to control every aspect of his or her retirement; or would choose to be the owner, free and clear, of their own retirement nest egg," he said.

About 200 people were invited to the 15-minute program, during which Cheney took no questions. The White House invited about three-fourths of the audience, including students affiliated with groups such as college-age Republicans and the Heritage Foundation. About 50 Catholic University students, faculty and staff members were invited by the school's administration.

Educators told Vatican has approved National Directory for Catechesis

LINTHICUM HEIGHTS, Md. (CNS) — The Vatican has approved the U.S. National Directory for Catechesis and it is scheduled to be published in May, Catholic educators were told Jan. 10 at a national symposium on the directory.

The publication of the new directory will mark "a promising new moment for the church in the United States," Bishop Leonard P. Blair of Toledo, Ohio, told the gathering of about a dozen bishops and nearly 200 leaders from diocesan religious education offices across the country.

Calling the new directory an important step in "the ongoing renewal of catechesis" in the United States, Bishop Donald W. Wuerl of Pittsburgh said, "It should be a time of great optimism for us."

The directory, adopted by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in the summer of 2003, replaces "Sharing the Light of Faith," the catechetical directory adopted by the U.S. bishops in 1977 and approved by the Vatican in 1979.

The new directory reflects significant changes in catechetics since the 1970s, including the emphasis throughout the church in recent years on placing catechesis more clearly within the framework of the church's fundamental mission of evangelization.

The new document also reflects changes brought by the publication of the "Catechism of the Catholic Church" in 1992 and a new General Directory for Catechesis issued by the Vatican in 1997.

May 1 is the target date for the directory's publication. A leader's guide and two summaries of the directory will also be made available for publication in diocesan newspapers or parish bulletins to inform the general Catholic public.

The directory and related materials will also be published in Spanish as soon as possible.

Vatican says pope to attend World Youth Day, but won't visit Poland

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While Polish church leaders have spoken for months about a possible papal trip to their country in 2005, the Vatican spokesman said it would not happen.

"A trip by the Holy Father to Poland, a country where elections will be held in 2005, is not foreseen for this year," said Joaquin Navarro-Valls, papal spokesman.

In a Jan. 12 statement, he said, "however, I confirm the trip of the Holy Father to Cologne (Germany) for World Youth Day."

The pope is scheduled to join young people from around the world Aug. 18 in the German city and to remain with them until after the Aug. 21 celebration of the World Youth Day closing Mass.

Polish Cardinal Jozef Glemp of Warsaw, speaking to reporters after visiting Rome in early November, said hopes for a papal visit should be "accompanied by realism" in view of the pope's health, but he said the pope was "expressing a willingness" to travel home.

Vatican official says Catholic press helps with sense of community

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic press can help build a sense of community by helping individuals realize they are not alone in practicing their faith, said U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley.

Catholic newspapers not only provide "authentic information about the church and society," but they also form "a true sense of Catholic community," he said.

They make "us realize that we are not alone in practicing our faith" and provide "good ideas about how we might be able to strengthen our faith and share it with others," he added.

Archbishop Foley, president of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, made his remarks Jan. 12 in an address to communications professionals in Accra, Ghana. The council released the archbishop's written remarks at the Vatican the same day.

When it comes to using the press as an instrument of evangelization, Catholic journalists are called to lead exemplary lives, he said.

If not, "many people will not listen to our message, because the messenger himself or herself appears to lack credibility," he said.

Living a saintly life is the best kind of public relations the Catholic media can offer, he said.

"Mother Teresa is a much better argument for the Christian life than is an advertising campaign," he added.

Finally, Catholic communicators must always be "open, truthful and accessible," he said.

People "will not listen to the good news we seek to share unless we are honest with them about the unfortunate bad news that sometimes occurs," said the archbishop.

72 YEARS OF SERVICE

Six Sisters of St. Joseph remembered for early mission work in N.C.

PHILADELPHIA — In the past 14 months, six Sisters of St. Joseph from Philadelphia, Pa., who served in the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh, have died.

Their ministry in North Carolina began in 1943 at the request of the late Bishop Eugene L. McGuinness. The first assignment for the sisters was St. Leo the Great Church and School in Winston-Salem.

Three of the sisters tutored and taught at Villa Maria Anna Academy and then the new St. Leo the Great School. They also taught faith formation in the parish, as well as in several other parishes in the diocese.

They were: Sister Michael Edward Martin, who taught first grade at St. Leo the Great School 1944-1955, died Jan. 27, 2004; Sister Rose Philippine Smith, who taught second grade at St. Leo the Great School 1949-1967, died Oct. 9, 2003; and Sister St. Hilda Clark, who taught third grade at St. Leo the Great School 1949-1961, died April 26, 2004.

The other sisters were: Sister Borgia Stack, who was principal of Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point 1960-1966, died Oct. 17, 2004; Sister Paschal Cooper, who was principal of Immaculate Heart of Mary School 1967-1973, died Dec. 8, 2004; and Sister Ann Hannan, teacher and parish worker at St. Ann Church and School in Charlotte 1973-1992, died April 29, 2004.

All six sisters died at St. Joseph Villa, a retirement home of the Sisters of St. Joseph, and were buried in the community cemetery. They gave a total of 72 years of service to the dioceses of Raleigh and Charlotte — the Diocese of Charlotte was founded in 1972.

Many of those early years were when North Carolina's Catholic population numbered less than one-quarter of 1 percent.

Memorials may be sent in the sisters' names to: St. Joseph Villa, 110 W. Wissahickon Ave., Flourtown, PA 19031.

UNC-Asheville chancellor to step down in May

Mullen to lead Catholic liberal arts college in Mass.

ASHEVILLE — James Mullen Jr., chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Asheville, announced Dec. 9 that he will step down from that office in May 2005 to become president of The College of Our Lady of the Elms, a Catholic liberal arts college in Chicopee, Mass.

"The presidency at Elms College calls me home to my roots and to serve my faith," said Mullen. "It is a presidency that I have accepted because it represents a singular call to return home and help a Catholic college that I know well to achieve its full measure."

Mullen will have served for six years as chancellor when he departs in May. During his tenure at UNC-Asheville, the liberal arts university has seen growth in its student population.

"I am saddened by Jim's departure, but I am grateful for the time he and his family shared with this community," said Sue McClinton, chair of the UNC-Asheville board of trustees. "His mark on this campus and this state can perhaps most eloquently be summarized by the strength of his relationship with students — for in them he vested his trust and hopes for the future."

A search committee for the university's next chancellor will be appointed within a few weeks. The goal will be to have a new chancellor selected and in place by fall, according to Molly Corbett Broad, University of North Carolina president.

James Mullen Jr.

A native of western Massachusetts Mullen attended and holds degrees from the College of the Holy Cross, the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and the University of Massachusetts in Amherst. Prior to his appointment at UNC-Asheville in April 1999, Mullen was vice president of Trinity College, a liberal arts college in Hartford, Conn.

The College of Our Lady of the Elms, founded in 1928 by the Sisters of St. Joseph, is located near Mullen's hometown of Holyoke, Mass. The 650-student liberal arts college seeks to combine education for life with education for a career. Mullen's appointment was approved by the Elms College board of trustees Dec. 6, 2004.

BLUE MOON RISING

OEO program helps turn dreams into reality

Office supported by DSA contributions

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

MURPHY — Five years ago, Rachel Elise Adams was working five part-time jobs and making and selling herbal body-care products.

"I was so distraught because I worked so many jobs," Adams said. "I failed badly in my business."

Today, her business, Blue Moon Elise (formerly Blue Moon Herbs) is growing — seeded with help from the Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Economic Opportunity/Catholic Social Services, which receives funds from the Diocesan Support Appeal.

A few years ago, health problems seemed to indicate Adams, 26, needed surgery. Deciding against that, she looked for alternatives and eventually studied at the North Carolina School of Natural Healing in Asheville.

She became adamant about using products without chemicals or preservatives and started Blue Moon Herbs in 1999 to produce 100-percent synthetic-free body-care products.

"My passion when I started was that I really wanted to affect the health of people and the planet in a small way that had a larger affect," Adams said.

Getting started wasn't easy. She worked several jobs during the day. She spent evenings crafting her herbal soaps, bath salts and other products at home.

When she first learned of ABLE

Rachel Adams (right) talks with customer Mary Beth Cornwell at Blue Moon Elise, Adams' herbal body-care-products shop in Murphy.

(Assets Building Long-Term Equity), she was suspicious.

The ABLE program started with funding from the Diocese of Charlotte and grants from the Duke Endowment and the North Carolina Department of Labor. The Office of Economic Opportunity in the Bishop Begley Center in Murphy administers the ABLE Matched Savings Program, designed for low-income people in Cherokee, Clay, Graham and Swain counties who want to improve or start small businesses, buy homes or obtain further education.

When an individual joins the program and saves $1,000, for instance, ABLE will contribute double the savings for a total of $3,000.

ABLE partners with the Mountain Micro Enterprise Fund (MMF), which offers a seven-week course to teach business skills and determine if the business proposal is sound.

"When I first heard about ABLE, I thought it was a hoax," she said. "Why would anybody match my money twice?"

Kim Crisp of the Office of Economic Opportunity and Kelly Long of the MMF convinced her to try.

"It was the answer to a prayer," said Adams.

ABLE participants must save $20 a month, but Adams saved $100 a month, earning the ABLE matching funds in less than a year. Then she hesitated.

"When the money became available, I didn't use it right away," she said. "That's where (the Mountain Micro Enterprise Fund) helped me with a business plan."

Adams opened a shop near Murphy's main business area in October 2003. She also began advertising on the Internet.

Within six weeks, she was working 16-hour days to fill incoming orders. In May 2004 she opened a 1,900-square-foot shop in Murphy.

In addition to her own line of products, Adams sells all-natural bath and beauty goods from other manufacturers.

She still calls MMF and Joan Furst, Office of Economic Opportunity's director, when she needs advice.

"Joan comes in to check on me to see how I'm doing," Adams said. "I feel like I have professional advice; I don't feel so alone. They treat me as a professional."

"This is an indirect example of how contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal help make a difference in the lives of people across the Diocese of Charlotte," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the diocese.

"While the seed money Rachel needed to start her business came from grant sources, the support provided by the Office of Economic Opportunity came in part from DSA contributions," said Gaddy.

The 2005 DSA, which runs Jan. 30-March 15, helps fund 36 ministries and agencies throughout the diocese.

The Office of Economic Opportunity is one of 36 ministries funded in part through the Diocesan Support Appeal that helps serve as the "hands of Christ."

FROM THE COVER

Panel discusses racial unity

segregation and away from the ideals of the civil rights movement."

According to Cook, one way to improve relations between the many races living in the United States is to start talking candidly about issues, especially misconceptions.

"It's not easy, but it's the only thing that will get us past the status quo," he said.

No easy solutions

The power white people are born into is part of the problem, according to Toni Tupponce, past chair of the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry and a board member of Catholic Social Services. She is a parishioner of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

"Power is intoxicating and addictive," she said. "European Americans are born into power, and they are unwilling to give it up (through programs like affirmative action)."

"It can get in the way of harmony, when someone needs to take a subordinate role (in order that) another voice can be heard," she said.

"People must risk standing up for what they know is right, even if they might face scorn," Tupponce said.

Tupponce suggested that one way to promote racial harmony is for people to become involved in another neighborhood's projects and activities. She emphasized that one-time projects helping a family or an area are not effective in creating harmony. A "hand up," rather than a handout, provides more assistance in the long run.

There are no practical approaches to dealing with issues of racism and "classism," Tupponce said.

"It begins with you once you decide that you're willing to 'take the knock' that will come with taking a stance," she said. "Not because it looks good or is politically correct, but because it's the right thing to do."

"Then you're going to influence someone else," Tupponce continued. "You don't even have to talk about it — just do it."

"I have the sense that a lot of people believe the 'heyday' of trying to work on race relations is over," said the Rev. Andy Baxter, executive director of Mecklenburg Ministries. "It's hard to find language that makes people who are not already on board want to get on board."

Rev. Baxter, an ordained minister of the United Methodist Church, urges white people to ask themselves, "What does racism do to you as a white person? What did growing up white do to you spiritually?"

Once people consider this question, people of all races can work together in more authentic ways, he said. In order to achieve racial harmony, white people must be willing to give up their seats as board members and make an effort to do business with minority business owners.

One person's example will influence others in a positive manner, Tupponce said.

"When the battle for racial justice becomes a matter of people's attitudes and personal prejudices, you might lose the sense of the larger, systemic issues," said Rev. Baxter.

"A large number of people seem to have a problem with the issue of racial unity in general," said Rev. Baxter. Many people prefer the term "racial harmony," suggested by Tupponce.

Tupponce emphasized the importance of harmony among races, more so than unity, which can encourage or even force people to abandon their native cultures.

"It can get in the way of harmony when someone needs to take a subordinate role (in order that) another voice can be heard," she said.

"When we do get together to dialogue, I think it would be interesting if we started from the premise that we are more different than we are the same," said Rev. Baxter.

Although many of the people who gathered for the panel discussion disagreed with Rev. Baxter's assertion, he said, "The spirit of that (statement) is that I have noticed that when I am in these types of discussions, people, especially whites, feel such a need to condemn prejudice and racism that there is a sense that acknowledging cultural differences is wrong."

Faith: Cure or disease?

Studies conducted in several cities, including Charlotte, showed that a large percentage of people involved in "faith-based engagement" have the worst scores in interracial trust. Faith-based engagement refers to active involvement in religious activity.

Of 40 metropolitan areas surveyed in 2002, Charlotte and its 13 surrounding counties ranked 39th in interracial trust and fourth in faith-based engagement.

"Across the country, there seems to be an inverse correlation between the amount of faith-based engagement in a community and interracial trust," said Rev. Baxter.

Rev. Baxter said he personally does not completely understand the correlation interracial trust and faith-based engagement, but presented the idea for consideration during the panel discussion.

"I would prefer it if that were not the case, but it comes up enough in studies that it should give pause to people," he said. "Something is not going right in the way we (operate our) churches."

From the Passover to the Paschal Mystery

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 4

Over the past three weeks, we have reiterated that the goal or purpose of the Mass is to worship God as perfectly as we are able. If our goal is to worship God as perfectly as possible, it would make sense that he would teach us how, even demonstrate the way it is to be done; it would make sense that he would provide us with an accurate method that is pleasing to him.

That is why last week we recognized that God is the author and the legislator of sacred ritual. As Christians, we always follow the example of Jesus Christ. Because Jesus is God, he has divine authority to establish and demonstrate the type of worship that is most pleasing to the Father; as man, he perfectly accomplishes it on our behalf and left us an example to follow.

So, what did Christ establish as the perfect worship and how did he do it?

We read in sacred Scripture that on the night before he died, he celebrated the Passover with his apostles. During the meal, our Lord fulfilled the meaning of the Passover and instituted the new and everlasting covenant. The Last Supper became the first Mass. Since the Passover formed the context of the first Mass, we need to look for a moment at the significance of the Passover.

In the Old Testament book of Exodus, we read that after the Israelites were enslaved to the Egyptians for 400 years, Moses negotiated with Pharaoh for the release of the Israelite slaves from bondage. Before the final plague, the death of the first-born, God told Moses to instruct the Israelites to kill the Passover lamb, to take a bunch of hyssop and dip it in the blood, and spread the lamb's blood over the doorposts of their houses.

That evening, when the destroyer arrived to slay the first borns in the land of Egypt, he passed over the houses of the Israelites and killed the first borns of the land of Egypt. Pharaoh finally let the Israelites go — they were saved, released from bondage.

Consequently, God instituted the Passover as an annual memorial to remind the Jews that God delivered them from slavery to freedom. In the Old Testament, God instructed his people how to worship him through the re-presentation of the Passover.

And in the New Testament, God himself would fulfill the meaning of the Passover by bringing it to its completion in the passion, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

We read in sacred Scripture that during the Passover meal, "the Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took bread, and when he had given thanks, he broke it, and said, 'This is my body which is for you. Do this in remembrance of me.' In the same way also the cup, after supper, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me' (I Cor. 11:23-25)."

The Passover meal is now fulfilled. In the Old Testament, the Jews sacrificed the Passover lamb. They ate the flesh of the lamb and its blood saved them from political slavery. In the New Testament, Jesus sacrificed himself as "the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world." He offers to us his flesh to eat and his blood delivers us from the spiritual slavery of sin.

In the Old Testament, God instructed his people how to worship him through the re-presentation of the Passover. In the New Testament, the son of God instructed his apostles to worship the Father through the re-presentation of the holy sacrifice of the Mass.

The Mass re-presents and makes present the perfect sacrifice of Christ on Calvary, which brought glory to the Father and redemption to mankind. For 2,000 years, the church has faithfully followed the command of the Lord to "do this in remembrance of me." Christ teaches us and demonstrates the pattern of perfect worship.

This week concludes our background material on the Mass. Next week, we will begin to look at this pattern of worship that God established for us to follow.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Catholics can receive special indulgences during eucharistic year

Cardinal outlines requirements for indulgences

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — During the Year of the Eucharist, which runs through October, Catholics can receive special indulgences for eucharistic adoration and prayer before the Eucharist.

Pope John Paul authorized the indulgences in order to encourage in the faithful "a deeper knowledge of and a more intense love" for the Eucharist, said U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary.

The Vatican published the cardinal's statement announcing the indulgences and outlining the requirements for receiving them Jan. 14.

An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment due for sins committed.

Cardinal Stafford said the special eucharistic year indulgences include the normal requirements set by the church for all plenary indulgences: that within a reasonably short period of time, the person goes to confession, receives the Eucharist and prays for the intentions of the pope, all in a spirit of total detachment from the attraction of sin.

Special plenary indulgences, he said, would be given to those who fulfill the normal requirements in conjunction with participating "with attention and piety in a sacred function or a pious exercise carried out in honor of the Blessed Sacrament, either solemnly exposed or preserved in the tabernacle."

In addition, he said, those who recite the vespers and compline prayers of the Liturgy of the Hours in a church or chapel where the Eucharist is present in the tabernacle will receive a plenary indulgence.

A consecrated host is pictured inside a monstrance, used for exposition, Benediction and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

Cardinal Stafford said that Catholics who because of illness or other serious reason cannot visit a church or chapel could still earn the indulgence if they make the visit "with the desire of their hearts, in a spirit of faith in the real presence of Jesus Christ in the sacrament of the altar."

Those who cannot go to church, he said, should recite the Lord's Prayer, the creed and a short prayer about the gift of the Eucharist.

The cardinal said Catholics who are physically unable to do even that could receive the indulgence by offering their illness and difficulties up to the Lord and uniting their prayers with the prayer of someone fulfilling the requirements.

Cardinal Stafford asked priests around the world to explain indulgences and the conditions for receiving them to their faithful and to be generous in making themselves available to hear confessions so that Catholics could fulfill all of the requirements for them.

and ministries," he said.

This year, contributions to the DSA will help serve as "the hands of Christ" to those in need by providing funds for Catholic Social Services; educational, housing and multicultural ministries and the vocations program.

"Being the hands of Christ, we are called to action," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of the diocesan development office. "The DSA is a concrete way to help build God's kingdom here in the diocese. It also is a means of sharing what you have with others."

The goal of this year's DSA is $3,950,000, and it can only be achieved with support from Catholics across the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Contributing to the DSA gives the Catholics of western North Carolina an opportunity to be a part of something bigger, and to help the church in its ministry throughout the western half of the state," said Bill Weldon, chief financial officer of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We are very conscious of the sacrifices people make; we have a strong sense of responsibility to use the funds as prudently as possible to achieve the goals of the various ministries and agencies," said Weldon.

People power

The reach of the DSA is far and wide, said Gaddy, including: providing resources and workshops for parish and school catechists; funding seminarian education and diaconate formation; providing funds toward Catholic Social Service's ministries; and allowing Hispanic coordinators throughout the diocese to assist their pastors in serving Spanish-speaking parishioners.

"The DSA funds a large part of Hispanic Ministry at the diocesan level," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry, "so it makes it possible to have a full-time resource person in almost every vicariate."

"These coordinators are very dedicated, they have experience and travel many miles each month to be of help in the parishes so the Hispanic community can feel welcome and a part of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Charlotte," said Sister Inkrott. "If it wasn't for the DSA, we wouldn't be able to do this."

"The program directors work very hard to stretch every dollar in funding so as to maximize the services rendered," said Weldon. "They also work very hard to generate additional funding for their programs and ministries."

Dissecting the DSA

"Although there is outside funding for almost all ministries, the DSA is the primary funding source for them, with the exception of Catholic Social Services, which generates approximately three-fourths of its total funding from sources other than the DSA," said Weldon.

Each of the parishes and missions within the Diocese of Charlotte is assigned a target — "their share of the overall goal of $3,950,000," said Weldon. "This is accomplished by using a formula established by a task force of lay people, pastors and finance council representatives."

Parish offertory from the last fiscal year is the starting point, said Weldon. Then, 25 percent of parish subsidy to Catholic schools is subtracted from the parish offertory. The resulting number is the basis for a mathematical computation that determines each parish's pro-rata share of the DSA goal.

"If, through parishioner contributions, a particular parish goes over its target, the excess is rebated to the parish," said Weldon. "If a parish falls short of its target, the parish is expected to make up the difference from its own budget."

"Most of the programs and services offered by the DSA-funded ministries are provided by staff of the diocese," said Weldon. "Consequently, the largest category of these expenses is personnel-related. The DSA only provides funding for direct program costs. There is no allocation of administrative costs."

"As an example, accounting and finance costs are administrative expenses, not direct program costs," he said. "Therefore, none of the funds collected through the DSA are used to pay for accounting costs."

Planning for this year's DSA began last fall as budgeting for the 2005-2006 fiscal year began. The goal represents an increase of 4.64 percent over last year's goal, said Weldon.

"We have tried very hard to limit cost increases while expanding program services," he said.

Establishing the current goal of $3,950,000 involved account-by-account budgets for each program and ministry that receives DSA funding, said Weldon. "Two components — program changes and cost increases — are examined when establishing the DSA budget. The amount budgeted for each ministry is published in this issue of The Catholic News & Herald (on pages 8-9)."

"As the people of the diocese entrust us with their gifts, we are then accountable to them for the use of these resources," said Weldon.

"We are committed to the highest standards of fiscal integrity and accountability," he said. "Every fall, we present a financial report in The Catholic News & Herald that presents the previous year's actual DSA funding by ministry."

Making the pledge

In the coming week, registered parishioners will receive pledge cards and letters at their homes from Bishop Peter J. Jugis, asking for their support of the DSA. Parishioners may send in a donation with those cards for all or part of their pledges. Reminder cards will be sent out in May for the amount not yet paid, and that amount may be paid over a period of six months.

"I am grateful for your support of the Church through your own gifts of time, talent and treasure," wrote Bishop Jugis.

"When we give to the DSA, we are participating in the educational, vocational, multicultural, housing and Catholic Social Services ministries that serve as the hands of Christ here in the diocese," he said.

'Angels and Demons' tour: a novel approach to Rome

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The day is fast approaching when tourists circling Rome might be seen with their noses stuck between the pages of a Dan Brown novel rather than a map or guide.

It has already happened in Paris. Staff at the Louvre and the Church of St. Sulpice said they are approached daily by Holy Grail seekers clutching worn copies of Brown's novel, "The Da Vinci Code."

The demand for details about the artwork and architecture featured in Brown's best-selling novel caught most Parisian curators by surprise, so earlier this year some enterprising organizations started to offer "The Da Vinci Code" tours.

The tours seek to retrace the steps of Brown's fictional hero, Harvard professor of religious symbology Robert Langdon, and to juxtapose reality against the myths or factual errors in Brown's murder mysteries.

Now the same idea has come to Rome. As of Dec. 28, a guided tour based on Brown's other best-selling conspiracy novel, "Angels and Demons," was offered.

"American tourists asked us about 'Angels and Demons'" and where the different churches in the novel were, so "we started a tour," said Simone Gozzi, president of the cultural association Dark Rome, which organizes the tour.

While fictional, code-cracking Langdon whipped around Rome in unmarked Vatican sedans, Gozzi guides his armchair sleuths around the city in a chauffeured minivan.

In the novel, Langdon races to prevent the murders of four eminent cardinals on the night of a conclave and to avert the legendary Illuminati sect's threat of destroying the Vatican.

Gozzi's tour concentrates on visiting just the Illuminati's alleged four altars of science by following the fictional Path of Illumination.

"We didn't want to add anything else" like a visit to the Vatican, because "I don't think the Vatican is a big fan of Dan Brown," Gozzi told Catholic News Service.

The head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, told CNS that Brown's books combine "interests in the religious, the mysterious and the conspiratorial."

Archbishop Foley said he's not surprised the novels harbor some factual errors because the books are "supposed to be fiction." The real problem hinges on whether people with "a superficial religious formation may take the book as Gospel and be deceived," said the archbishop.

However, Gozzi said he "didn't get the idea the people on the tour wanted the book to be true."

He said even though people came to Italy just to do the tour, their aim seemed to be to satisfy a curiosity that was sparked by the story and "to see what the sites they read about really look like."

The clues readers needed to unravel the novel's mystery essentially were hidden in some of Rome's statues and architectural designs by 17th-century baroque artist Giovanni Lorenzo Bernini.

The "Angels and Demons" Rome Tour brings visitors to those masterpieces, ranging from Bernini's more obscure "Habakkuk and the Angel" in the Church of Santa Maria del Popolo to the Fountain of the Four Rivers in Piazza Navona.

It's not the first time a book or movie has awakened curiosity in a reader and inspired travel, but the Brown conspiracy novels may be turning popular novels into additional money-making ventures.

The four-hour "Angels and Demons" tour run by Gozzi is priced, for now, between $61 and $272, depending on group size.

Though Langdon fans can certainly hunt for the clues and murder scenes on their own, Gozzi said a guided tour sets the historical record straight, in this case concerning the Illuminati, the Inquisition, and the church's trial of 17th-century astronomer Galileo Galilei.

Eternal happiness is worth focusing on

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

This year's batch of family newsletters enclosed in Christmas cards was a typical collection: a lot of achievement by our friends' children, a little achievement by our friends themselves, much care of our friends' parents, many exotic travels and a surprisingly large number of our friends' pets' signatures.

But one letter stood out, I realized, as my daughter and I talked, misty-eyed and fondly, about the family who wrote it. No, nobody died in their family. They had had some serious difficulties and also some great joys in the last year. But they never tell about any achievements in their letters.

In fact, when we lived in the same neighborhood (so we didn't get letters), we never heard them even talk about family members' achievements, although we'd witnessed plenty.

This has to be one of the highest achieving families I've ever known. But what do they talk — and write — about themselves?

They write about family occasions to get together; about love lost and love found; about the joy in their relationship with each other and with friends; about how God has blessed them with strength and endurance in trying times and illness; about their delight in God's grace; about their trust in God's unfailing care.

I read today's Gospel and thought of this family when I read the Beatitude, "Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be satisfied." This family never seemed to hunger for success, but only to live well, caring for each other and especially for their community.

No wonder they always are filled with joy, since they hunger for something that promises to satisfy. Worldly success seems to be something that happened to them along the way, but they didn't hunger for it.

The Beatitudes aren't telling us about a group of people — the poor in spirit, the meek, the peacemakers — who get to heaven, inherit the land and are the children of God. The Beatitudes offer us a countercultural focus for our own lives: lifestyles that promise satisfaction and happiness.

The final Beatitude suggests a caveat: Counterculturalism brings persecution. Yes, and it makes a great Christmas letter. God is among us.

'Chorus' worth singing about

Gerard Jugnot stars in "The Chorus," a sentimental French film about a failed musician who takes a teaching job at a boarding school for troubled boys in the late 1940s, and helps them overcome their delinquent ways by forming a choir. The film features first-rate performances and heavenly singing, making this a surefire pleaser even as the setup is transparently manipulative. Some crude language, a brief verbal suggestion of sexual impropriety and a few violent episodes. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

18th annual video contest for college students

NEW YORK (CNS) — Student filmmakers will compete for $6,500 in prizes in the 18th annual video contest sponsored by The Christophers for college students.

Entries, due by June 10, must interpret the theme "One Person Can Make a Difference" in a short film that runs five minutes or less.

The work of the top winners will be featured on more than 100 television outlets through a special edition of the internationally syndicated program "Christopher Closeup."

Past winners have used a variety of styles and genres, including drama, comedy, documentary, news format, music video and animation. Entries have come from a diverse field of studies.

able, the unborn, are not being allowed to have their voices heard, because their voices are silenced by abortion."

Bishop Jugis began with brief comments on the incomparable worth of the human person created in the image of God.

"A new life that is conceived is a separate person from either parent and has an inalienable right to life," he said.

During the invocation, Bishop Jugis asked for blessing upon the pro-life movement and all those gathered in commemoration of the 32nd anniversary of Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

The crowd then heard remarks by Congressman Walter Jones Jr. of North Carolina and Lynda Bell, a past president of Florida Right to Life.

Before the rally, Bishop Jugis mingled with the crowd, shaking hands and thanking people for their participation. Many of the young people were thrilled with the bishop's personal attention and commented on the bishop's approachability.

The rally and march followed the sixth annual Prayer Breakfast, at which about 200 people heard testimonies on the power of prayer in everyday life, especially in the pro-life movement. They were also honored to hear Al Barbarino, a lay apostolate Franciscan with the Padre Pio Shelter in New York, who performs concerts for charity throughout the United States and overseas.

While this was the largest rally and march to date, the events in Raleigh were only the kickoff of local pro-life observances throughout the state. Many people across the nation, as well as a large group from the Diocese of Charlotte, will gather for the annual March for Life in Washington, D.C., Jan. 24.

TSUNAMI RELIEF

Catholic students raise funds for tsunami victims orphaned and a million people homeless. As the nations affected by the tsunami continue to recover from the disaster, students throughout western North Carolina have joined people around the world in relief efforts.

Students at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem have raised $3,000.

"Our outreach coordinator, Maureen Patti, and the student council encouraged giving through flyers, announcements, a bake sale and the Thursday Newsletter," said Georgette Schraeder, principal. "The students and teachers have also written letters and prayers for the people who suffered so much loss."

The student body of Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro has a special connection to the Diocese of Port Blair, India. Bishop Alex Dias visited Winston-Salem in August 2004 as part of a missionary trip. Bishop Dias' diocese includes the areas of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, where more than 7,500 people are believed to have died.

"When Father Frank O'Rourke, our pastor, realized that (Bishop Dias') diocese was right in the midst of the tsunami and earthquake zone, (Father O'Rourke) called him on the phone and got an answer," said Shirley Kinlaw, interim principal.

"It was then that Father Frank indicated to him that our parish would be taking a second collection on Jan. 9, to aid his cause in particular," said Kinlaw. "From that offer sprang the idea to have the schoolchildren make cards to accompany the financial gift of the parish."

Our Lady of Grace Church and School have collected more than $30,000 for the Diocese of Port Blair. Each homeroom is preparing a card with a note indicating that their prayers are being offered for the intentions of the members of Bishop Dias' diocese.

"The children in Sri Lanka and across that region of Asia have experienced so much tragedy and loss. We hope that by bringing comfort to their soles, we can touch their hearts with a message of God's love," said Emmanuel Ohonme, president and founder of Samaritan's Feet.

Students at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School collected more than $3,200 through a "dress-down day" Jan. 7. For a $1 donation, students were allowed to wear jeans with their school or team uniform shirt. Many parents also donated money, and many students gave $5 or $10. The funds will be donated to Catholic Relief Services through Catholic Social Services.

At Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte, students will collect money during Catholic Schools Week, Jan. 31-Feb. 4. All donations will then be given to Catholic Relief Services through Catholic Social Services.

When Carolina Panthers quarterback Jake Delhomme attended a pep rally at St. Patrick School in Charlotte, he gave the school a life-size cardboard cutout of himself. The student council decided to raffle off the cutout, and more than $800 was raised for the United Nations World Food Program.

Being the 'Hands of Christ'

DSA helps us spread Christ's love to others

Guest Column

BARBARA GADDY
GUEST COLUMNIST

"How are you the hands of Christ?"

That is what I asked about a dozen people in my own parish last weekend. Since the theme of this year's Diocesan Support Appeal is "We are the Hands of Christ," I decided to find out how the people in the pew related to the theme.

On my way out of the church, I stopped Juvarez, a parish teen-ager who is an altar server. He didn't waste a minute thinking about the question. "It means helping others like Jesus (did)," he said. "We give to charities and we go there and help to serve others in need."

A bright young man, I thought. I wonder what some of the other teen-agers think. In the vestibule I ran into Andrew. He immediately said, "I am the hands of Christ when I share my faith with others." Wow, another smart teen with a good answer!

As I was looking for another unsuspecting target, David, a talented catechist with a powerful singing voice and a kind heart, approached me about "Keith," a child whose parents dropped him off for a class that was not meeting. As David searched around the church for Keith's teacher, I thought of the many ways he was serving as the hands of Christ — teaching, singing and caring for displaced children, to name a few.

While I waited with Keith, I decided to seize the moment and ask this young second-grader how he was the hands of Jesus. He took a moment to think about it and, with a little prompting, said that he "cleans his room for his mom when it is messy — and it sure is messy a lot!" Reluctantly, he mentioned sharing with his brothers and sisters.

We weren't able to reach Keith's parents, but Angela, another catechist who was leading the children's Liturgy of the Word at the next Mass said she would stay with Keith. Out came the crayons and worksheets, and Keith was attending his very own class.

I thought of the countless ways Angela serves as the hands of Christ — the number of children whose lives she touches in faith formation, the parishioners whose Sunday Mass experience is enriched by her beautiful voice as a cantor.

Then along came Deacon Peter. I thought to myself, how many ways does a deacon serve as the hands of Christ? Deacon Peter teaches RCIA and sacramental preparation; he preaches at Mass, baptizes, officiates at weddings and funerals; he visits the sick. On top of that, he entertains countless people with his musical talent.

Martha, a lay ministry graduate, came over after working at the "Roses for Life" table in the vestibule. She is serving as the hands of Christ by helping to promote respect for life. Then I thought of the many other things she did such as teaching children and adults, visiting the sick, serving as a eucharistic minister and decorating the church for special liturgies.

Marianne, a young certified nursing assistant who works with the elderly at a local nursing home, joined us, so I took the opportunity to ask how she was the hands of Christ. I really wasn't prepared for her incredible answer.

She responded, "Every day I help 50 people live another day. I am a friend to people who feel they have no purpose in life, and I help them find a reason to live. We laugh and cry together. We celebrate milestones and accomplishments together. We share stories ... and I love my job."

I had barely regained my composure when I saw more "hands of Christ." Grace and Roy do everything from training liturgical ministers to repairing broken toilets. Bernie uses his hands to conduct the choir as well as fix the paper towel dispenser.

As I sat down to write this column, I thought about all those "hands of Christ" from the pastor to the maintenance worker, from the elderly to the children, working together in the parish. It takes the combined work of many hands to bring the message of the Gospel to others. I am sure this is true in every parish throughout the diocese.

It is also true at the diocesan level. The DSA gives each of us the opportunity to serve others in catechetical ministry like David, Angela and Martha. Along with Martha, we are part of the respect life ministry when we give to the DSA. Everyone can't work with the elderly like Marianne, but a gift to the DSA is a way of supporting our Catholic Social Services' diocesan elder ministry. In fact, my short tenure as a "roving reporter" uncovered seven DSA-funded ministries — faith formation, youth ministry, RCIA, Elder Ministry, Permanent Diaconate, Respect Life and Lay Ministry Training — all serving as the Hands of Christ.

How do your hands serve him?

Barbara Gaddy is associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

What does 'laicization' mean?

Q. When a priest is defrocked or laicized because of grievous offenses against Catholic laws, what does that mean? May he still say Mass and give the sacraments? If he can, may it be in his house or in a church? I thought a priest is a priest forever. (New York)

A. It is true that through ordination a priest definitively becomes part of the clerical order in the church. The "indelible character" of holy orders never ceases, but the legal status of the priest as part of the clergy may be lost, either through death or by lawful dismissal from the clerical state.

The penalty of dismissal from the clerical state, often called "laicization," is the only one remaining of several penalties against members of the clergy that were formerly in Catholic Church law.

The process for dismissal of a priest is usually lengthy and extremely complex, deliberately designed to protect the rights of everyone — any victims, the offenders and other Catholics or members of civil society who may be affected by the offenses themselves or by a decision of laicization.

Obviously, this drastic punishment is used only in the most serious or scandalous circumstances. It may be applied in only seven specific instances, which are listed in the section on crimes and penalties in the Code of Canon Law. Among others, these instances include violation of the eucharistic species, commission of sexual offenses through force or threat or publicly, and physical attack on the pope.

When a priest is properly dismissed from the clerical state, he is no longer bound by any obligations of that state,

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

including the obligation of celibacy, which is normally dispensed from in the documents establishing laicization.

A priest who is dismissed also loses all rights proper to the priesthood. He is prohibited from exercising any function connected to the priesthood and holy orders.

The single exception is that he may hear confessions of people in danger of death and absolve them from sins or other spiritual censures that may burden them. Interestingly, not only is a dismissed priest permitted to do this, he is obliged to do so by church law if any member of the "Christian faithful" is in a situation of such urgent necessity (Canons 976 and 986).

Some penalties are imposed on certain priests today, generally in connection with the sexual abuse scandal, with effects similar to laicization but which are not formally and canonically loss of the clerical state. In addition to other penalties, the priest may not be permitted to celebrate Mass publicly, but may, as you note, do so privately, for example in his own home. Conditions in these instances vary widely.

The basic legislation concerning dismissal from the clerical state is in the Code of Canon Law 290-293.

Letters to the Editor

Social Security's future shouldn't depend on government

Glenmary Father John Rausch's syndicated column on Jan. 14 ("If it's not broken, don't fix it") was disheartening, at best. His mistrust of "privatization" seems greatly unfounded. It is known that Social Security will begin to take in less "receipts" than "payouts" in the year 2018. By 2030, the system will have twice as many payouts to the elderly, as income from younger contributors.

It is also known that the plan only will derive 4 percent of the Social Security income to invest in the market that has averaged a return of 10 percent (including all risk) over its history, while Social Security has managed only 1 percent, at best. The endpoint of Social Security as we know it is approaching. What do we risk when that happens?

Father Rausch's last question, "... a community of care encouraged by the Gospel," is a good one. Worded better it should ask, "Do we do what the government tells us, or do we do what we consider better for the oppressed?"

I don't believe Jesus ever said that the government would be our savior. He knew we had to depend on each other. Government programs in the past have hurt as many as they have helped.

It seems much more passionate to allow seniors a greater return on their investments by putting more people to work and investing more in America. The system's broken, but do we have the courage to change it now, rather than experience expenses later?

— Kevin Roeten, Asheville

Slavery column enlightening

It was pleasing to read such a true story by Carole Norris Greene ("Tsunami by another name," Jan. 14). Her column was enlightening and should be shared amongst students from middle school and up. I look forward to more columns from her.

Caution: dangerous e-mails ahead

I admit it — I love e-mail. I couldn't do my job with out it. I use it to communicate, both professionally and personally. I use it to avoid talking to certain people on the phone.

Frankly, it saves me a lot of time. It also wastes a lot of my time. But I wouldn't give it up for all the money in the world.

We have to be careful with this tool, because it can be used for the most destructive, violent of means — spreading untruths, hate, information that allows terrorists to make bombs and young girls to become anorexic or bulimic. So we have to be careful.

Whenever I hear someone say, "I read this or that on an e-mail," I usually assume that it's just not true. We've all heard the stories — the young girl kidnapped outside a Wal-Mart in South Carolina, Bill Gates will send you $100 to help him test Microsoft's new e-mail tracking system. Maybe at some point these stories were true, but the more the stories circulate through e-mail, the less likely they are to be true — like a giant game of "telephone."

Last summer, I got an e-mail from a co-worker stating that verse 9:11 of the Koran says "For it is written that a son of Arabia would awaken a fear-

As I Was Saying

KAREN EVANS
STAFF WRITER

some Eagle. The wrath of the Eagle would be felt throughout the lands of Allah ... the wrath of the Eagle cleansed the lands of Allah; and there was peace."

This was an obvious allusion to the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 and the United States' invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq.

I was skeptical that something this clearly prophetic would be true. So I looked up verse 9:11 in the Koran on the Internet. I found that, not only does verse 9:11 mention nothing about an eagle liberating Arab nations, there is no mention of an eagle anywhere in the Koran.

E-mail can be a wonderful tool for sharing Christ's Gospel, too. I treasure the prayers, encouragement and jokes

I receive from my friends. But whenever I reach the bottom of the message, and I am instructed to forward the e-mail to five friends and I will be granted a wish in five days, or forward the message if I love Christ, a shiver of revulsion goes through me.

Who is this wish-grantor monitoring my e-mail? When I make a wish on a falling star, I don't really think there's some entity listening to my thoughts and granting my wishes. If that were true, I would be married with a brood of children by now.

Is Christ sitting on his throne in heaven with a laptop, hacking into my Yahoo! account to see if I forwarded my latest e-mail to the required number of friends? Christ knows I love him. I don't need to pass a guilt trip along to my friends to prove it.

Why do we blindly accept these declarations? The only way to make our wishes come true or to prove our love to Christ is through prayer, and prayer in action. I can personally testify to the fact that God does answer prayers — in his way, in his time.

So the next time you're online, read all your e-mails with a healthy dose of skepticism and common sense. God is watching.

Christians must pray for unity, pope says

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Prayer, dialogue and cooperation to restore Christian unity are obligations for all Christians, Pope John Paul II said.

Marking the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity at his Jan. 19 general audience, the pope led an estimated 7,000 people in praying for Christian unity.

Before embracing the cross and going to his death, Christ prayed that all his disciples would be one, Pope John Paul said, introducing the prayers for the churches of the East and West, for all those baptized in Christ and for all those who give witness to the Gospel in the world.

In his audience talk, the pope said the Jan. 18-25 week of prayer is an important occasion "for reminding Christians that the re-establishment of full unity among them, according to the will of Jesus, involves every baptized person, pastors and faithful alike."

The Catholic Church, he said, has just celebrated the 40th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's Decree on Ecumenism, "a key text which placed the Catholic Church firmly and irrevocably in the heart of the ecumenical movement."

The reconciliation of the world's Christians, he said, requires more than human efforts and talents, which is why prayer for unity is so important.

"But prayer must be accompanied by the purification of minds, feelings and memories," leaving behind bitterness over past events, he said. "In that way, it becomes an expression of that 'interior conversion' without which there is no true ecumenism."

Pope John Paul praised those engaged in ecumenical dialogue, both on a theological level and in the field of cooperation in concrete projects to help others.

"The pain of separation is felt with increasing intensity in the face of the challenges of a world that awaits a clear and unanimous Gospel witness from all believers in Christ," he said.

The pope asked those in attendance to join him in praying "that the whole family of believers would reach as soon as possible the full communion willed by Christ."

The pope then greeted clergy and catechists from the Neocatechumenal Way and blessed its founders.

The pope prayed that members of the faith formation program would "deepen, with a docile spirit, communion with the pastors of local churches and with the competent offices of the Holy See. In this way, you can offer an ever more effective contribution to the cause of the Gospel."

He'd Rather not

CBS anchorman and others act without accountability

Dan Rather, the CBS news anchorman, is a tall fellow, well over six feet. He is easy to pick out of a crowd. But he was hard to find on the day last week when CBS News owned up to a huge mistake.

Rather was exercising a prerogative that news people in general, and television news anchors in particular, enjoy. He wasn't being held accountable for what he did. To understand the news media in this country, you first must appreciate the fact that accountability is at the bottom of the media's list of priorities.

A story that came to be known as "memogate" engulfed CBS News in September when the network aired a story, hosted by Rather, about a memo critical of President Bush when the president was in the Texas National Guard during the Vietnam war.

The memo may have been a fake, but even if it wasn't, an outside investigation showed that CBS violated its own standards in the production of the story. Four people you never heard of lost their jobs over the incident. But Rather, the biggest star on the network, the man whose name is most closely associated with the story, is still on the job.

Why? Because he is not accountable; because as the most important name at CBS, he embodies the CBS brand and no corporation can afford to destroy its own brand name.

Think of what might have happened if the story were completely true and it turned the electoral tide in favor of John Kerry. The new president may easily have decided to award a Presidential Medal of Freedom to CBS, and who do you think would have accepted the accolades? Not one of the people who was fired; no, the credit would have gone to Rather.

Journalism in America occupies a unique and important niche. The free press guarantee of the First Amendment gives all of us access to a lot of very important information. Freedom, in this case, also means that news organizations have no oversight or control by a government agency. Journalists are not licensed; they have no generally accepted professional standards and there are no ethical or professional boards that people can complain to when they feel they have been wronged by the media.

This is probably the main reason that many people fear the media.

For the most part this system has worked well. The press is robust in presenting viewpoints as varied as Pat Robertson and Dennis Miller, and government knows that it cannot hide the public's business from the watchdog press. In addition, most individual news organizations have ethical rules. But "memogate" shows that some people are above the rules.

Mr. Rather has had a long and very distinguished career as a journalist. He was in Dallas when President Kennedy was assassinated; he stood up for truth when confronted by President Nixon during Watergate. He has been on the scene of countless national stories, calmly presenting facts that very often were not very pretty. But in "memogate," he is the bad guy and he is getting away with something here because he and his profession lack true accountability.

On the night that CBS dutifully reported that the investigation into "memogate" was complete, that four people lost their jobs and that steps were being taken to ensure the credibility of the CBS news product in the future, Mr. Rather was inexplicably off the air. A back-up anchor occupied his customary seat. When asked for his reaction to the whole affair, Mr. Rather, or perhaps it should be Mr. Rather-Not, had no comment.

Diverse ecumenical crowd gathers for installation of Archbishop Gregory

Bishop, priests from Diocese of Charlotte attend Mass

BY MARY ANNE CASTRANIO
THE GEORGIA BULLETIN

COLLEGE PARK, Ga. — An ecumenical, diverse crowd gathered at the Georgia International Convention Center Jan. 17 to witness the installation of Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory as the sixth archbishop of Atlanta.

Archbishop Gregory, formerly the bishop of the Diocese of Belleville, Ill., recently completed a three-year term as the president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The approximately 8,000 people in attendance included dignitaries from around the United States, including five cardinals: Cardinal Francis George of Chicago; Cardinal Edward Egan of New York; Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia; Cardinal William Keeler of Baltimore; and Cardinal Theodore McCarrick of Washington, D.C.

Fifty-two bishops attended, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte. Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte; Deacon Curtiss Todd, vice chancellor; and other priests of the Diocese of Charlotte were present.

Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States, concelebrated the Mass along with Archbishop Emeritus John F. Donoghue and the cardinals, abbots and priests present.

During the canonical installation, Archbishop Montalvo read the apostolic letter from Pope John Paul II, which stated that Archbishop Gregory had done "outstanding work as bishop and as president of the bishops conference." This letter was the formal acknowledgment of Archbishop Gregory's appointment as archbishop.

Archbishop Montalvo then seated Archbishop Gregory in the cathedra, the bishop's chair, and presented him with the crozier, the symbol of his role as shepherd of the Lord's flock. At that moment, the new archbishop took up his role.

Archbishop Gregory stood as applause swept through the convention center. He appeared deeply moved and accepted a warm embrace from his predecessor, Archbishop Donoghue.

Then more than 200 priests, people from the archdiocesan community, ecumenical and interfaith representatives, and civic officials came up to welcome to the new archbishop.

In his homily, Archbishop Gregory addressed the priests of the archdiocese.

"To the presbyterate of Atlanta, I welcome the opportunity to serve with you the needs of the faithful in this local Church and to carry on the rich heritage of pastoral dedication that those who preceded us have established as a hallmark and a goal," he said.

He also referenced the importance of the day on which he was being installed, the birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

"Today, which is a moment of historic importance for the Archdiocese of Atlanta and of personal joy for me, is also a day of great significance for all the peoples of our nation," he said. "We gather in prayer and festive joy on Dr. King's Memorial Day and in a city that holds a special place among all American cities that reverence this great man's legacy."

He went on to say that he hoped the "values of racial justice and harmony" that were so powerfully espoused by Dr. King would continue to be an enduring legacy.

Each time a church in Iraq is attacked or a religious figure is threatened or kidnapped, most church leaders there quickly explain that the incident does not signal an assault against Christianity.

But Christians in Iraq are afraid.

As a tiny minority in an overwhelmingly Muslim nation, Christians enjoyed relative religious freedom under former President Saddam Hussein's otherwise oppressive, though secular, rule.

The U.S.-led embargo, then war and occupation of Iraq that toppled Saddam's dictatorship brought further hardship to the people there. Damaged infrastructure and

BLIND FAITH

Kerri Regan, 17, offers to answer a question during class at Holy Trinity Diocesan High School in Hicksville, N.Y., Jan. 13. Regan, who is blind, was a contestant in the "Jeopardy!" teen tournament, scheduled for broadcast in late January.

Catholic high school student competes in 'Jeopardy!' teen tournament

HICKSVILLE, N.Y. (CNS) — Because of a confidentiality agreement, 17-year-old Kerri Regan could not reveal if she bet big bucks on the "Jeopardy!" daily double. But she did mention her secret to qualifying as one of only 15 high school students to appear on the "Jeopardy!" teen tournament this year.

"I read a lot and soak up a lot of useless trivia," said Kerri, a senior at Holy Trinity Diocesan High School in Hicksville. She also tunes into "Jeopardy!" almost every night.

She beat 1,500 teens for the chance to fly to Los Angeles and participate in the show, where players pick a category, host Alex Trebek gives a clue and the contestant who hits the buzzer first must supply the correct response in the form of a question.

She said Trebek enjoyed talking to her, but he really loved her dog, referring to the 2-year-old black Labrador retriever that constantly accompanies her. Kerri is blind and the Labrador is her guide dog.

Kerri appeared on "Jeopardy!" Jan. 27. She also appeared on commercials with Trebek promoting the quiz show's teen tournament.

Recently, with her dog at her feet in her advanced placement government and politics class, Kerri typed notes into a small Braille computer on her desk. She often wonders why people are so interested in her life because, "I am the same as everyone else except I read Braille and take a dog to school."

But it is hard not to marvel at her everyday life. She finds her chair every day among hundreds of chairs in the lunchroom. She reads books by feeling the words with her fingertips. She listens to people without being prejudiced by their appearance.

Holy Trinity faculty members applauded her wit, intelligence, devout faith, adaptability and the way she affects others' lives.

In addition to taking advanced placement courses, Kerri worked at Catholic Charities and was runner-up for homecoming queen. She is a leader in the Science Olympiads, which recognize achievement in science, and participates in youth ministry programs at her school and parish.

Kerri plans to attend college and become a history teacher. She has been trained to be an advocate for herself in a seeing world, but she also knows that God will help her overcome anything that comes her way.

"Every once in a while, I still whack into fire doors or get lost," she said, but added, "Honestly I have never thought about being anything else (but blind)."

Bishops' secretariat publishes new directory of lay groups

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Family, Laity, Women and Youth has published the eighth edition of its Directory of Lay Movements, Organizations and Professional Associations.

In a Jan. 7 letter to the bishops accompanying the 2005-2007 edition, Bishop Dale J. Melczek of Gary, Ind., chairman of the Committee on the Laity, said the directory "contains most of the commonly known Catholic movements and organizations that are national in scope and whose membership consists of a majority of lay persons."

The 46-page publication contains brief descriptions of more than 115 U.S. Catholic lay movements, professional associations, organizations, secular institutes, third orders and lay associations, and lay missionary/volunteer service groups.

It also provides for each listing a name, address and phone number for contact, as well as Web and e-mail addresses, where available.

According to the directory's introductory material, some of the listed groups that are not exclusively lay are included "because their work affects the life and mission of the laity and/or because their membership has a significant lay component."

The directory includes Catholic groups that exist to support lay ministry, such as the National Association for Lay Ministry and the National Center for the Laity, along with many well-known Catholic agencies, such as Catholic Charities USA and the National Catholic Educational Association, whose missions are broader.

The secretariat said it welcomes suggestions for groups to be included in future editions, and the last page of the directory is a form to facilitate that.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says high number of migrants, refugees requires dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II said the high number of migrants and refugees in the world requires dialogue to favor friendship and cultural understanding.

The pope made the remarks at a Sunday blessing Jan. 16, which the church celebrates in many countries as the World Day for Migrants and Refugees.

"I offer my cordial greetings to all migrants and hope that dialogue may favor the growth of sympathy and understanding among the various cultures," he said.

The pope examined the sensitive question of social integration of migrants. He said integration should not be seen as "an assimilation that leads migrants to suppress or to forget their own cultural identity."

Instead, the pope said, it should be a process of mutual sharing that can gradually shape societies and cultures when "valid aspects" of newcomers are accepted.

"In this process the migrant is intent on taking the necessary steps toward social inclusion, such as learning the national language and complying with the laws and requirements at work, so as to avoid the occurrence of exasperated differentiation," the pope said.

The United Nations estimated that at the start of 2004 there were 17 million asylum seekers, refugees, internally displaced people, returned refugees and stateless people in the world. The recent earthquake and tsunami in Asia and Africa increased that number by several million.

Newspaper reports Hitler ordered kidnapping of Pope Pius XII

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Adolf Hitler personally ordered one of his senior Nazi officers to arrange the kidnapping of Pope Pius XII toward the end of World War II, according to new information cited by an Italian newspaper.

Instead of carrying out Hitler's order, the officer met secretly with the pope in May 1944 to warn him of the plot. A month later, the Nazis were fleeing Rome, and Hitler's plan could not be carried out.

The reconstruction of the kidnapping scenario was published Jan. 15 by the Italian Catholic newspaper Avvenire, based on testimony taken by church experts examining a possible declaration of sainthood for Pope Pius.

Purported plans by the Nazis to abduct Pope Pius and take him out of Italy first came to light in the Nuremberg trials after World War II, but details have been sketchy.

According to Avvenire, church experts in Germany received sworn testimony March 24, 1972, from Gen. Karl Friedrich Otto Wolff, head of the Waffen SS, or Nazi elite guard, in Italy.

Wolff said that in 1943 Hitler had first raised the idea of abducting Pope Pius and removing him from the Vatican, but his aides were able to talk him out of the idea. Then in 1944, as German forces were in retreat, Wolff met with Hitler again in Germany.

"I received a personal order from Hitler to kidnap Pope Pius XII," Wolff told the church investigators.

Upon returning to Rome, Wolff arranged to meet with the pope. After entering the Vatican clandestinely in civilian clothes, Wolff told the pontiff of Hitler's order and warned him to be on guard.

Jesuit Father Peter Gumpel, who is working on the sainthood cause of Pope Pius, said Wolff's account coincides with other evidence that has emerged about Hitler's mistrust of the pope and his hatred of the church.

Vatican historians have documented Hitler's antipathy toward the pope on other occasions, arguing that the Nazi dictator saw the church as an enemy of National Socialism and a friend of the Jews.

Despite criticism by some Jewish groups, the work on the sainthood cause of Pope Pius has continued in recent years. This spring, the Vatican's Congregation for Saints' Causes is expected to begin discussions on the material gathered to date.

NC CATHOLIC TO CONVERT TO MONTHLY MAGAZINE FORMAT

RALEIGH (CNS) — NC Catholic, the newspaper of the Raleigh Diocese, will become a four-color monthly magazine, with the first issue planned to arrive in homes by Easter, March 27.

"While this is certainly the most dramatic change in our diocesan publication, the NC Catholic has evolved continually over its history," said Father Joseph Vetter, who headed a publications committee to study the feasibility and desirability of converting the newspaper to a magazine format.

Father Vetter, a former editor of the newspaper and former chancellor of the diocese, said the paper's "relationship with readers changed when it ceased being a weekly newspaper due to rising costs."

While the magazine will contain information on upcoming events, the diocese will utilize its new Web site, now under construction, for current news and events taking place in the diocese.

The site, scheduled to be online in late March, will have a comprehensive diocesan calendar and a regularly updated "e-pistle," which will contain a combination of news items and scheduled events.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis opened the day's program.

"I am most grateful for your ministry," Bishop Jugis told more than 60 attendees. "I am so grateful for individuals like you who hear the Lord's call to come into this ministry."

Bishop Jugis spoke on the Year of the Eucharist, which runs until October, saying that, "The Eucharist is where our lived experience of the risen savior is going to be intensified for us."

The bishop suggested that those in educational ministry use Pope John Paul II's document "Ecclesia de Eucharistia" for prayer reflection.

"During the Year of the Eucharist, evaluate your own spiritual practices regarding preparedness (for Mass), which is challenging when classes are sandwiched between Masses," Bishop Jugis said. "Do spiritual reflection beforehand, read the readings."

Commenting on the importance of such retreats as this, he said, "All the ministries of the church have to have the spiritual dimension as the primary focus of their ministries. This is a way of responding to the need that their catechetical ministries be centered in Christ."

"The spirit of the Lord is here, present in power and love," Father Hawker said. "When Jesus said 'When two or three are gathered in my name, I am in their midst,' he was talking about you and you know it."

Father Tom Stott dies at 58

ALBANY, N.Y. — Father Tom Stott, a priest of the Diocese of Charlotte on medical leave, died at the VA Hospital in Albany, N.Y., Jan. 18. He was 58.

Father Stott was pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton until his failing health brought about his medical leave. He was residing at his family home in Albany.

A funeral Mass was celebrated at St. Francis de Sales Church in Albany Jan. 21. Burial followed in Our Lady of Angels Cemetery.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated a memorial Mass for Father Stott at St. Dorothy Church Jan. 28.

Father Stott was ordained to the priesthood by then-Bishop Michael J. Begley at St. Ann Church in Charlotte on Oct. 15, 1983. His assignments included assistant pastor at St. Ann Church and St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem, and pastor of St.

Father Tom Stott

Joseph of the Hills Church in Eden, St. John Church in Waynesville and Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy.

Father Stott was also a decorated veteran of the Vietnam War.

year's readings from the Gospel of Matthew: "Matthew had to wrestle with problems, wrestle with reality, just as we do every day, in our jobs, with ourselves. We try to make sense out of reality and help others to make sense of reality."

Among Matthew's themes, he said, is the message that discipleship is difficult: "Jesus makes it very plain through Matthew that discipleship requires humility, trust, zeal for the house of God."

Discipleship requires unity.

Father Hawker commented on Matthew 9:2-8, the story of a paralytic brought to Jesus to be healed.

"The beautiful message of this Scripture is that we are called and enabled to bring people to Jesus, and we cannot do it alone," Father Hawker said. "Right in this room, right now, we are bringing people to Jesus through prayer, through encouragement, through support."

"When I look at your face and you look at my face, we see the face of Jesus. We are the rainbow," he said. "We value one another, we cherish one another because we are all in this together."

LIVING THE FAITH

THE BIG GOODBYE

Parishioner honored for longtime service to poor, community

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
- CORRESPONDENT

HAYESVILLE — "Nobody had a better time in Clay County than [me]," Edgar Moeller said.

More than 100 people, just some of those with whom he's been having such a good time for the past 37 years, honored Moeller, 87, at a Mass and luncheon at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church Jan. 7.

Moeller is leaving Hayesville this month for Atlanta to be close to his son, Edward.

"Ed(gar) has been our resident Catholic on the board and has made such a terrific contribution," said Rev. Rufus Stark, chair of the Hinton Rural Life Center (HRLC), a Methodist organization that provides housing and other services to the poor and elderly in and near Clay County and trains Methodist pastors.

Mollie Stewart, HRLC staffer, said Moeller was the first person she met when she arrived in Clay County; she'll miss the hugs he gives her whenever they meet.

"We feel so honored to have had him on our board and helping to extend services to Clay County," said Karen Borchers of United Way of Cherokee and Clay County.

Judith Alvarado, executive director of REACH of Clay County, gave Moeller a plaque during the luncheon.

"Ed has touched my heart and the hearts of many in REACH," she said. "I love you, we love you and we're going to miss you. You'd better stay in touch."

Moeller was a lector and usher at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church. He founded the local Meals on Wheels and the Elderly Neighbor program, which provided home repairs, visits and transportation for the elderly; was on the Southwest Regional Council on Aging; and was on the Clay-Cherokee Christian Housing Inc., which built DeSoto Square, a 32-unit apartment complex for low-income elderly people.

"In many ways, in these activities he represented the Church," said Father George Kloster, pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

"He was very ecumenical in his perspective," said Father Kloster.

Moeller credits the Sisters of Loretto with "pounding" education into him at Sacred Heart School in St. Louis, Mo., and where he graduated in 1931.

"They taught me I could learn anything if I put my mind to it," he said.

His first jobs in those Depression years included working on an assembly line for 22 cents an hour. He served in the military during World War II and landed at Normandy, June 12, six days after D-Day. As a civilian, he was an Army logistician.

After visiting Hayesville over the years, Moeller retired and he and wife, Barbara, moved there on New Year's Day 1967. Barbara was also involved in community activities.

One of his first volunteer activities was providing transportation for elderly women.

"That opened my eyes to what poverty really is in Clay County," he said. "You got to know (people) and how times were really tough here. One man told me he made 22 cents on an assembly line."

It was the same pay Moeller had earned years earlier in that Depression-era factory.

Ed and Barbara were married 52 years when she died of Alzheimer's disease in 1999. Moeller continued volunteering.

"It's just part of being a Catholic — that you'll help the poor," he said. "It seems to me that was sort of a requirement no matter where I went."

His neighbors, all natives of the area, were "the best I've had in four states," he said. "Honest, hard-working, God-fearing people. They think family is the most important thing, and I think that's right. They're not chasing the almighty dollar."

Moeller's greatest satisfaction, though, was to help wherever he could.

"There is more reward," he said, "in doing for others than any money you earn in a profession or job."

sponsored the annual event, celebrated for the past 18 years. The ministry was established in 1985 to give visibility to the work of black Catholics in the diocese and educate various diocesan groups to the needs and contributions of black Catholics in the church.

According to Deacon Curtiss Todd, vicar of the African American Affairs Ministry and vice chancellor for the Diocese of Charlotte, the ministry celebrates Rev. King's birthday each year in order to "keep his dream alive."

"We have a tendency to forget African Americans who are regarded as heroes, and what they accomplished," he said. "Young people today know the name Martin Luther King Jr., but they may not know his message."

In previous years, the celebration consisted of a guest speaker and a series of workshops, held on the weekend before National Martin Luther King Jr. Day, the third Monday in January.

For the 2005 celebration, the event was held the weekend following the holiday, so as not to conflict with other commemorative events taking place in the Charlotte area. Event planners also strove to present an ecumenical program, appealing to all races and religions.

At a morning prayer breakfast, the Rev. Dr. Sheldon Shipman, pastor of Greenville Memorial AME Zion Church in Charlotte, gave the keynote speech.

In his conclusion, Rev. Shipman said that Rev. King once said that his greatest fear was not being put in jail or even assassinated; his greatest fear was a disinterested church.

"We are the church," said Rev. Shipman. "And if we allow racial injustice to occur, we have become a 'disinterested church.'"

The morning's activities concluded with a tour to the Levine Museum of the New South to view "Cotton Fields to Skyscrapers," a permanent exhibit featuring Charlotte as a case study illustrating the changes in the South since the Civil War.

America has lost ground in recent years in the struggle for racial unity, said Sandy Murdock, a parishioner of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte and a board member of the African American Affairs Ministry.

"We were most unified as a people during the lifetime of Dr. Martin Luther King," said Murdock. "Throughout the black community, there is a feeling that we often go to the aid of others before going to the aid of our own."

"Since his time, we have not had that leadership," she said. "I do hope that there is someone who can make a mark as he did."

A preacher and civil rights leader, Rev. King sought to bring peaceful reconciliation between all Americans, urging racial justice and equal opportunity for all, regardless of race.

While in Memphis, Tenn., to support striking black workers in 1968, Rev. King was assassinated April 4 by James Earl Ray, an escaped convict. After his death, Rev. King became a symbol of protest in the struggle for racial justice.

from five local Catholic and Protestant churches performed gospel music from key periods in black history.

"Each choir represents a different period in the evolution of gospel music from the 1800s to the 1960s," said Rosheene Adams, a parishioner of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte and a board member of the African American Affairs Ministry.

The earliest black American music — the Negro spiritual or slave song — dealt primarily with the concept of triumph over adversity. Early gospel music grew out of the Reconstruction Era of the 1870s, when newly freed slaves struggled against racism and prejudice.

In the 1950s, gospel music was reborn as freedom songs used by demonstrators for civil rights. The songs continued the tradition of black music focusing on God's promises of love and salvation.

"Martin Luther King came out of the Baptist Church and I'm sure he had (experienced) the kind of songs we listened to today," said Ed Hood, a parishioner of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

"No matter what denomination, race or creed you come from, music is a source of softening the heart for the word of God," said Hood.

"Music was a savior for blacks in the olden days, sung to escape (the harsh life of slavery)," said Gigi Mangum, choir director for The Golden Angels, the choir at the North Charlotte House of Prayer. "For me, music is a place to go higher and rise above our circumstances."

"Martin Luther King was trying to bring everyone together on one accord," said Hood. "That is the only way that God and Jesus would have us to live here."

Rev. King taught that the way to have a peaceful life is to bring all people together in peace, love and harmony through Jesus Christ, said Hood.

"In God's eyes, there is no black and white," Hood said. "He only looks at the spirit."

Council raises funds for Holy Angels, other organizations

"We saw there was a need for the funds," said Greg Argenas, a co-chair of the council's Operation LAMB campaign. "The work they do is incredible."

"We've had a long standing relationship with the Knights and they've always been so generous," said Dennis Kuhn, Holy Angels' executive vice president and chief operating officer. "This is an extraordinary gift ... and we're deeply appreciative of everything they've done for us."

Holy Angels is a private, nonprofit corporation that provides innovative programs and services for its residents — children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation, some of whom have physical disabilities and are medically fragile.

"The money we've received will help with the operation and needs for medical equipment and services we provide to the children and adults with mental retardation," said Kuhn.

The same day the knights also visited Joshua's Farm in Charlotte, where they saw a riding exhibition and made a $6,000 donation.

Founded in 1996, Joshua's Farm is a working farm exposing disabled children and adults to therapeutic horseback riding, animal interaction, sensory gardens and accessible nature trails.

The 11-year-old Council 10852 singly raised more than $55,000 for the LAMB Foundation of NC in 2004, the first time in the now 32-year history of the foundation that an individual council in North Carolina has exceeded the $50,000 mark in one calendar year.

"A lot of people worked very hard to accomplish this goal," said Argenas.

The Knights of Columbus raised the funds for their Operation LAMB drive through corporate and private donations and their famous Tootsie Roll campaigns at area retailers. Since its inception in 1974, Operation LAMB, named after the biblical quotation, "... whatsoever you do to the least among my brethren, that you also do to me" (Matthew 25:40), has raised more than $14 million to assist citizens of North Carolina with mental retardation.

"We were pleased to raise the amount of money we've raised this year," said Richard White, co-chair of the Operation LAMB campaign. "It allows us to increase what we do."

Other local and statewide organizations to benefit from Council 10852's fund-raising include Special Olympics, Mecklenburg ARC, St. Matthew Church, Allegro Foundation, Easter Seals, Life Span, Carolina Computer Access Center and Christian Adoption.

Introibo Ad Altare Dei

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 5

Last week, we concluded our introductory material on the Mass. We recognized that Jesus Christ fulfilled the Old Testament Passover ritual with his sacrifice, which he instituted at the Last Supper, the first Mass.

This week, we begin the longer and more arduous task of examining this ritual established by Our Lord and developed by his church. It is essential to note that the heart of the Mass, the consecration of the bread and wine into the body and blood, soul and divinity of Christ, was demonstrated by Our Lord and given to his church. This act is attributed to Our Lord. The remainder of the Mass developed organically as the Holy Spirit inspired the church through the centuries.

We will come to discover that every ritual, activity, posture and response is laden with meaning from sacred Scripture and sacred tradition. So, the purpose of these teachings is to reveal the more profound meaning within each action of the Mass.

Before each Mass begins, the celebrant and the ministers must first enter the sanctuary. This ritual is known as the entrance procession and is accompanied by the opening hymn, which prepares the faithful to unite their minds and hearts to the worship of God. This is the first of two processions in the Mass. (Later, we will examine the second procession: when the faithful process forward to receive holy Communion.)

The entrance procession includes the celebrant, either a bishop or a priest, any concelebrating priests, deacons and the altar servers. The meaning of the entrance procession represents our Lord's earthly pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

When Jesus arrived in Jerusalem, he processed through the streets on a donkey to shouts of joy and victory by the awaiting crowd who held palm branches and welcomed him in song. Once a year, we recall this event on Palm Sunday. Within one week, this same crowd shouted for the crucifixion and death of their king. And so Christ would enter the sanctuary of Calvary wearing a crown of thorns to be enthroned upon the cross. From the cross, our Lord and king was victorious as he defeated sin, conquered death and redeemed mankind.

And so, for centuries the priest would arrive at the steps of the sanctuary and recite Psalm 42: "Introibo ad altare Dei. Ad Deum qui laetificat iuventutem meam." ["I will go unto the Altar of God. To God, who gives joy to my youth."] The entrance procession is a time for joy and victory, for our salvation is near!

Upon entering the sanctuary, the priest reverences the altar with a kiss. The altar has always been considered the greatest sign in the sanctuary for Christ, whose own body became the altar upon which he would sacrifice himself to the Father. The altar takes great prominence in the center of the sanctuary. It is the focal point of the Mass and the juncture between heaven and earth, time and eternity.

The altar is consecrated with sacred chrism and usually contains a relic of a saint. The relics in the altar have a two-fold significance: 1) the first altars were erected over the tombs of Christians in the catacombs; and 2) the Mass unites the sacrifice of a martyr's life with the sacrifice of Christ in the Mass.

Due to its importance, the altar receives the first incensation; three others may follow throughout the Mass. The sweet aroma of incense prepares the altar for sacrifice. Of all the symbolic ceremonies in the Mass, the use of incense is perhaps the oldest and the most widespread ritual, historically found in Jewish, Greek and Roman ceremonies. It is also mentioned extensively in Sacred Scripture, especially in reference to worship of God.

Now that the celebrant has ascended the steps of the sanctuary of Jerusalem, revered the altar with a kiss and incensed it, the Mass is ready to begin. We will continue next week.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Year of the Eucharist Youth Pilgrimage to BAC

BELMONT — Bishop Peter J. Jugis invites all high school and college students in the Diocese of Charlotte to join him for a Lenten spiritual pilgrimage at Belmont Abbey.

The afternoon of prayer and reflection will take place on Sunday, Feb. 27.

The pilgrimage is a part of the diocesan observance of the Year of the Eucharist, proclaimed by the Holy Father. During this year, which runs through October 2005, a series of programs and observances is scheduled to take place from eucharistic adoration in various parishes to the diocesan Eucharistic Congress Sept. 23-24 in Charlotte.

According to Father Roger Arnsperger, pastor of St. Barnabas Church in Arden and head of the diocesan planning committee for the Year of the Eucharist, "the youth pilgrimage is a wonderful privilege to commemorate and devote ourselves more faithfully to Our Lord, who is truly present in the holy Eucharist."

The schedule for the youth pilgrimage to Belmont Abbey includes a procession through the campus, remarks by Bishop Jugis and Abbot Placid Solari, Benediction and an informal bring-your-own supper.

WANT TO GO?

The diocesan youth pilgrimage will take place at Belmont Abbey, 3:30-7 p.m. on Sunday, Feb. 27, 2005. For more info, contact Paul Kotlowski at pjkotlowski@charlottediocese.org.

FIGHTING FOR LIFE

March for Life continues

unloved or (those who are) simply inconvenient become increasingly vulnerable."

Bush pointed to laws passed during his first term in office, including the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act in 2003. Implementation of the law has been held up by three separate federal district courts — in New York, Nebraska and California — which have declared it unconstitutional.

Under the measure, "infants who are born despite an attempted abortion are now protected by law," he said to applause. "So are nurses and doctors who refused to be any part of an abortion."

And, under the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, which he signed into law last April, "prosecutors can now charge those who harm or kill a pregnant woman with harming or killing her unborn child," Bush said.

In an allusion to federal funding for cloning and for stem-cell research, Bush added, "We're also moving ahead in terms of medicine and research to make sure that the gifts of science are consistent with our highest values of freedom, equality, family and human dignity. We will not sanction the creation of life only to destroy it."

The president made his remarks from Camp David in Maryland. The rally preceded their annual march to the Supreme Court building.

The March for Life usually takes place on the Jan. 22 anniversary date of the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade and Doe vs. Bolton decisions that legalized abortion virtually on demand. But when the anniversary date falls on the weekend, as it did this year, organizers choose the following Monday so participants can lobby their respective legislators on pro-life issues.

Despite a weekend snowstorm that socked much of the East Coast and Midwest, march organizer Nellie Gray estimated that 100,000 took part in the rally and march.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis and many others from the Diocese of Charlotte participated in the annual events. Bishop Jugis also celebrated the 10:30 a.m. Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

Maryann Tyrer, a teacher at Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville, made her second trip to the March for Life. She came to the event with 130 students in three buses. After being delayed due to snow, the group made it to Washington Jan. 23 and slept on a gymnasium floor at Catholic University.

"We're here to make a stand for life in all its stages," said Tyrer. "We hope the presence of this huge crowd will send a message to our elected leaders that a huge portion of the electorate is pro-life."

Tina Witt, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, made her fourth trip to the march with fellow parishioners and parishioners from Our Lady of the Americas Church in Biscoe. The cold weather did not dampen anyone's spirits, she said.

"Everybody was on fire to be there and stand as a witness for the unborn," said Witt. "The world will start to see that this can't be hidden anymore."

Speaking out against evil

On the eve of the March for Life, Cardinal Keeler celebrated a vigil Mass opening the National Prayer Vigil for Life at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington. There he told a congregation of more than 5,500 people not to give up hope in their efforts to change the country's abortion laws.

"The evil must end," he said.

Norma McCorvey, the "Jane Roe" in the Roe vs. Wade case, said of her recent petition to the Supreme Court to overturn the decision, "This is the day that I have been waiting for. ... We're looking forward to having the operations of death overturned."

The Roe decision threw out most state restrictions on abortion, while Doe, its companion decision, permitted abortions through all nine months of pregnancy.

Politically motivated

Virtually all of the other speakers were Republican members of Congress, many of whom praised their president and their party's approach to life issues, while decrying what they called "judicial activism" which brought about the Roe vs. Wade decision and the blockage of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act.

Bush, said Rep. Steve Chabot, R-Ohio, is "a friend who agrees with us," while his predecessor, President Bill Clinton, "blocked our moves at every turn." The Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, he added, was blocked by "an activist federal judge (who) usurped the will of the people."

"Somewhere in the Constitution they (judges) found a right to privacy, which included the right to take a baby's life even when it is one inch from being able to fill its own lungs" with oxygen during birth, said Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., said he would introduce the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act to require in part that women seeking abortions at 20 weeks' gestation or longer be informed that the child in their womb can "feel excruciating pain, two to four times more pain than you or I would feel from the same type of assault."

Smith added, "We are a movement with deep hope and expectation, that with God's powerful grace, the culture of death will be vanquished by the culture of life. We pray for the day when branding an unborn child as 'unwanted' will no longer mean a death sentence in America."

Supreme Court declines to act in case of brain-damaged woman

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court has declined to review a lower court decision overturning the Florida law that allowed Gov. Jeb Bush to order reinsertion of a feeding tube for Terri Schindler Schiavo, who is brain-damaged.

The decision, issued without comment Jan. 24, moved forward the efforts of Schiavo's estranged husband, Michael, to remove her feeding tube again, although other court actions initiated by the woman's parents, Bob and Mary Schindler, continue.

"What they've done here today is incredible. It's judicial homicide," said Bob Schindler of the Supreme Court.

He was attending the March for Life in Washington.

Schiavo, 40, has been impaired for the past 14 years. She can breathe on her own but requires nutrition and hydration through a feeding tube.

Michael Schiavo, who now has two children by another woman, says Terri would want the feeding tube removed. The Schindlers say that she would want to live, in part because of her Catholic beliefs.

Terri Schiavo, who lives at a nursing home in Florida, has been on a feeding tube since 1990, when she collapsed as the result of what doctors believe was a potassium imbalance, causing her brain to be deprived of oxygen for several minutes.

She was taken off the feeding tube Oct. 15, 2003, but it was restored a few days later by Bush's executive order. He issued the order after the Florida Legislature passed "Terri's Law," which allowed the governor's intervention in cases in which the patient has no living will, is in a persistent vegetative state and has had nutrition and hydration tubes removed and a family member has challenged the removal.

Nearly a year later, on Sept. 24, 2004, the Florida Supreme Court said the law violated the state Constitution's requirement of separation of powers by allowing the state Legislature and the governor to overturn a lower court decision.

Bush's spokesman said the governor had no more legal options in the case now that the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled.

Debate heats up over abortion litmus test for judicial nominees

Advocates on both sides step-up activism

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As concern about present and future appointments to the Supreme Court and other federal courts nears fever pitch among organizations working to assure that Roe vs. Wade remains law, the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities is taking a more measured approach.

"We're a church, not a political organization," said Gail Quinn, director of the bishops' pro-life secretariat. "We do not support or oppose nominees. That's not our role."

The committee's contribution to the debate on court nominees began Jan. 6 with a letter from Cardinal William H. Keeler calling on the U.S. Senate to reject the view that "nominees who oppose the purposeful taking of innocent human life (are) somehow unfit for judicial office in the United States."

The Catholic Church's right-to-life ethic "has profound consequences not only for abortion, but for many other areas of life, including the death penalty, the application of scientific research to human subjects, the right to adequate health care, and the role of the state in promoting the common good," said the cardinal.

"Our civil society will be all the poorer if senators, as a matter of practice, prevent a Senate vote on well-qualified judicial nominees whose consciences have been formed in this ethic," he said.

The Baltimore cardinal is chairman of the pro-life committee, which also is considering a nationwide postcard campaign aimed at the U.S. Senate — the first on a life issue since the 1998 blitz on partial-birth abortion — as well as educational campaigns targeting both members of Congress and the general public.

But the opposition to nominees viewed as pro-life will be staunch, judging from the outcry already being generated by groups such as NARAL Pro-Choice America and the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

Through its Web site, NARAL Pro-Choice America is recruiting what it calls "rapid responders" to mobilize against any Supreme Court nominee that the organization finds unacceptable.

Planned Parenthood is using the language and imagery of nuclear weaponry to warn about threats to the filibuster strategy in the Senate.

Planned Parenthood said that "right-wing conservatives in Congress" have come up with "what's been dubbed the 'nuclear strategy,'" which would allow the presiding officer of the Senate, Vice President Dick Cheney, to declare filibusters unconstitutional for judicial nominations, if a majority of senators agreed.

"This potential course of action has been referred to as 'nuclear,' because it would be the political equivalent of a nuclear explosion," Planned Parenthood said.

Any senator can hold up a vote by filibustering — or prolonging a discussion indefinitely — unless 60 senators vote for cloture — an end to the filibuster and immediate vote on the issue at hand.

In a Jan. 17 statement, Father Frank Pavone of Priests for Life said some senators "have made history in their obstruction of the constitutional process simply because (they) find the religious and ethical beliefs of some of the president's nominees unacceptable."

He vowed to make judicial nominations an election issue in 2006, and called for efforts "to restore the proper traditions of the Senate so that it may carry out its constitutional duties free of ideological captivity."

Although the issue of nominees to the Supreme Court remains moot until one of the justices decides to retire, Bush signaled his commitment to his choices for various federal judgeships late last year when Scott McClellan, presidential press secretary, announced that Bush would renominate 20 men and women who did not receive an up or down vote in the Senate during his first term.

In all, 204 of the 260 nominees submitted by Bush in his first term have been confirmed, according to the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Legal Policy.

"The Senate has a constitutional obligation to vote up or down a president's judicial nominees and the president looks forward to working with the new Senate to ensure a well-functioning and independent judiciary," said McClellan.

Values of believers, nonbelievers in politics discussed in book, by panel

WASHINGTON — In his new book, "God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It," the Rev. Jim Wallis, editor of Sojourners magazine and founder of the Call to Renewal anti-poverty movement, argues that it is time for the religious values of a broader cross section of Americans to have a role in the public sphere.

His book begins with the observation that "many of us feel that our faith has been stolen, and it's time to take it back."

"How did the faith of Jesus come to be known as pro-rich, pro-war and only pro-American?" Rev. Wallis asks in the book. "What happened here? And how do we get back to a historic, biblical and genuinely evangelical faith rescued from where the morals espoused by religion are taken into account in public policy but not simply on the basis of their connection to organized religion.

"Many people do draw their moral convictions from religion," Father Hehir said, "but many do not."

"I would structure debate always with morality as the mediating factor between religion and politics," he continued. The interests and claims of those who would impose their religious values on the country must be justified and translated in ways that "shows their value to those who don't share the religion."

Father Hehir gave the example of using religious justifications about war — "religious claims can be used both to set limits or to expand the reasons for waging war."

Rev. Wallis said the priest's proposal of using moral factors as a middle ground between those who are religious and those who are not "is exactly right."

"I don't believe religion has a monopoly on morality in a pluralistic society," Wallis said. "We can't allow that."

And in some ways, he said, religious people must be "disciplined by democracy. We can't say 'this must happen because I'm a Baptist and that's what we believe.'"

Rev. Wallis said the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., whose Jan. 15 birthday was commemorated with a federal holiday the day before the Brookings event, provided perhaps the best model for connecting one's religious beliefs with actions that could be understood to be moral by people of any or no religious beliefs.

When Rev. King spoke, Rev. Wallis said, "we knew who Isaiah was and who Jesus was, but he didn't exclude anyone in the process."

its contemporary distortions?"

At a Jan. 18 forum hosted in Washington on faith and politics, Rev. Wallis noted that a bumper sticker distributed by Sojourners during the past election read, "God is not a Republican ... or a Democrat."

"When either party tries to politicize God or co-opt religious communities for their political agendas, they make a terrible mistake," he said. "The best contribution of religion is precisely not to be ideologically predictable nor loyally partisan."

He said that God's politics are "never partisan or ideological. But it challenges everything about our politics," by reminding people of those neglected by politics — the poor, the vulnerable and others left behind.

"God's politics challenge narrow national, ethnic, economic or cultural self-interest, reminding us of a much wider world and the creative human diversity of all those made in the image of the Creator," said Rev. Wallis.

"God's politics remind us of the creation itself, a rich environment in which we are called to be good stewards, not mere users, consumers and exploiters," he said.

Father J. Bryan Hehir, secretary for social services in the Archdiocese of Boston and a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, said that while he agrees with many points in Rev. Wallis's book he "would have gotten there a different way," and would be more parsimonious about how religion is factored into politics.

He proposed a middle ground,

Shining lights serve as beacons

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Nobody likes a showoff.

We may momentarily be amused when athletes or politicians crow about their successes, but the appeal of the braggart is short-lived. We know instinctively that such behavior belies a sense of entitlement, of being exempt from customary responsibilities of behavior and etiquette.

Maybe that's why Sunday's Gospel, where Jesus urges us to let our "light shine before others so they may see your good deeds and glorify the heavenly Father," makes many of us uncomfortable. Having been turned off by the spiritual showboating and self-promotion of people who think they're more important than others, we don't want to succumb to the same temptation.

In fact, though, such false reticence can itself be a form of self-indulgence. For it is by our good works — including religious practices, of course, but also acts of charity and justice and honesty and compassion — that the Gospel becomes real for people.

In a quote made famous through the Internet (and often incorrectly attributed to Nelson Mandela), writer Marianne Williamson expresses the idea eloquently: "It is our light, not our darkness, that most frightens us. We ask ourselves, Who am I to be brilliant, gorgeous, talented, fabulous?"

"Actually, who are you not to be? You are a child of God. Your playing small does not serve the world. ... We were born to make manifest the glory of God that is within us. It is not just in some of us, it is in everyone. And as we let our own light shine, we unconsciously give other people permission to do the same."

As the conversion season of Lent approaches, may we so embody Christ's call to generosity, humility and reconciliation in our relationships with others that his light shines forth in our daily lives.

TRAGEDY TO TRIUMPH

Catholic faith a constant for NFL quarterback Favre and his family

BY MARYANGELA ROMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BROOKFIELD, Wis. — As the mom of Green Bay Packers' No. 4, quarterback Brett Favre, Bonita Favre has been along for the ups and downs of her son's career on and off the football field.

From Super Bowl appearances, MVP awards and record-shattering performances to the sudden death four days before Christmas last year of Irvin Favre, her husband of 38 years and Brett's father, the family has gone from triumphs to tragedies.

In October, more misfortune struck the Green Bay Packer legend's family. Casey Tynes, 24, the brother of Brett's wife, Deanna, was killed in an all-terrain vehicle accident on the Favres' Mississippi property and a week later Deanna learned she has breast cancer, for which she is now undergoing treatment.

Through it all, however, the Favre family's Catholic faith has been a steady constant, their main strength, said Bonita Favre.

"The main strength of all of us is our faith," she said. "Without God, we have nothing and with him anything's possible."

Bonita Favre is promoting her new book, "Favre," co-written with her son and Green Bay Press-Gazette sports columnist Chris Havel. The book is filled with photos and includes a DVD of personal and professional highlights.

Raised a Catholic, Bonita Favre said she attended an all-girls Catholic high school in Mississippi. Thirteen members of her graduating class of 33 entered the convent. One of those young women was Bonita's best friend, Patricia Ladner, who has been a Sister of Mercy for seven years.

Now a member of the state board of nursing in Louisiana and author of college textbooks on nursing, Sister Ladner is also Brett's godmother.

Bonita Favre called Sister Ladner her strength through the trials of her life. Her friend reminds her to "never give up, read that Bible every morning, say your prayers."

She admitted that she sometimes wonders why God has allowed so much grief to happen to her family, "but then I know a lot of other people (face tragedy, too) but theirs isn't public. With all the things that have happened to us in the last year, there are probably people right down the street that it's happening to. It's just ours was public knowledge."

Like her daughter-in-law, Deanna, Bonita Favre said she is also a strong believer that things happen for a reason.

"Even with Deanna's situation, she Samuel L. Jackson stars in "Coach Carter," a formulaic but interesting story of real-life basketball coach who accepts a job at a high school with the stipulation that all the players sign contracts agreeing to uphold academic standards, and when some of them don't, he grounds the entire team. The film is reasonably absorbing, and although parents may consider it important for inner-city kids to see this inspiring story, be warned that there's a good deal of crude language and an abortion subplot with questionable moral implications. Much crude language, drug dealing, some violence, abortion, suggestive dancing and sexual situations. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

feels that God has given her this cancer for a reason," she explained. "They say everything happens for a reason and sometimes it's hard to understand, but I think that I've found that even from adversity there's usually something good that develops from it."

In fact, she pointed to the Packers' game against the Oakland Raiders, a day after Irvin's death, as her favorite football memory. In front of a national audience, Brett threw for four touchdown passes, completing 22 of 30 passes for 399 yards en route to a 41-7 Packers' victory.

"There were just so many emotions that night," said Bonita Favre of the game.

The compassionate reception from Raider fans, whose reputation is far from affectionate, was also heartwarming, she added.

Bonita Favre has channeled some of her grief from the past year into the book project begun in March. For her second oldest son, Brett, however, the grieving process has been different.

"He has his own way of grieving," she explained.

Watching her son cope with Deanna Favre's diagnosis has also been difficult, said Bonita Favre, noting they share a feeling of helplessness.

When tragedy strikes, the Favre family is supported by the Catholic community and retired Bishop William R. Houck of Biloxi, Miss., who "is like a personal family friend," said Bonita Favre.

She also pointed to Deanna as a source of strength for the family. "She's definitely Brett's strength."

A former special education teacher, Bonita Favre said she is equally proud of all four of her children — there are no favorites. But she is especially proud Brett came public and conquered his drug addiction.

"He went through rehab and to go public with that and state that he would beat it and he did, that's a proud moment," she said. "If Brett tells you he's going to do something, you better pretty well believe it."

High Point student navigates toward state competition

HIGH POINT — Jackson Sams, an eighth-grader at Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, won the school-level competition of the National Geographic Bee Jan. 14.

On Jan. 18, he completed the required written test with hopes of competing against public and private school students for North Carolina's state title. The top 100 scorers on the test are eligible to compete in the state competition April 1.

State winners then compete nationally for a $25,000 college scholarship from the National Geographic Society.

The national competition, to be held in Washington, D.C. May 24-25, will be televised on the National Geographic Channel.

As part of the school bee, Immaculate Heart of Mary School sixth-through seventh-graders spent several days in early January answering oral questions about geography, world customs, cultures and politics.

Winners from the three grades then endured seven rounds of additional questions to determine the school's final four contestants: Jackson, Michael Herschel, Edward Kageorge and Kelsey Rochford.

Jackson Sams

Jackson and Michael survived to the school's championship round Jan. 14, in which they fought a single elimination battle for another four rounds until Jackson answered the winning question.

The National Geographic Bee, an educational program of the National Geographic Society, is a nationwide geography competition for U.S. schools with grades four through eight, designed to encourage the teaching and study of geography.

Students take 'stock' in contest

HIGH POINT — A team of four students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point recently placed 59th among more than 220 teams in a state-wide public and private school Stock Market Simulation Competition.

Eighth-graders Ryan Kordsmeier, Garrett McAuliffe, Emily Sickelbaugh and Brittney Spear made a "profit" of more than $7,500 in "playing" the stock market from October through December.

Teams were given $100,000 each in pretend money to buy and sell stocks. Whichever team made the most money in the market won a dinner in Raleigh as guests of the North Carolina Council on Economic Education, sponsor of the competition.

Jim Lindquist, Immaculate Heart of Mary's middle school math teacher, said the students used various media to research companies and stocks, monitor the economy and access stock prices. Students also wrote essays after the contest about what they learned about the stock market.

This year, as in past years, Lindquist said his students were most surprised about how you can still make a profit buying stocks in a down market and then "selling short."

the reigning chaos have altered life for everyone.

"Christians live like all people in Iraq, they have the same worries," said Archbishop Fernando Filoni, the apostolic nuncio to Iraq.

"But given these attacks, Christians are even more worried; it's understandable the church finds itself in double the difficulty," he said Jan. 18 between meetings with Vatican officials.

Unwanted connections

The added difficulty comes when certain fundamentalist groups see the church as a symbol or reflection of the Western world or when they assume church members are collaborators with the U.S.-led occupying forces.

Syrian-rite Archbishop Basile Georges Casmoussa of Mosul, Iraq, said Jan. 18 that Christians feel unsafe because "the U.S. soldiers deployed in various parts of the country, and whom the local inhabitants see as occupants, have helped create a negative image of Christianity among people of other faiths."

But confusing the church in Iraq as being an arm of the West "is very offensive, especially to the Chaldeans," said Msgr. Robert L. Stern, secretary-general of the Catholic Near East Welfare Association.

Chaldean Catholics, who make up the majority of Iraq's Christians, "resent the idea they are being identified as Western because they are original inhabitants" in Iraq, dating back to "before the time of Mohammed and the coming of Islam," Msgr. Stern said Jan. 21 in Rome.

Anti-Christian campaign

But not everyone interprets the violence against Christians and their churches as being just part of the general chaos or as a confused sense of the enemy.

Dominican Father Mikhael Najib told Vatican Radio from Iraq Jan. 18 that "there is a true campaign under way against Christians."

He said religious, priests and lay Christians in Mosul have faced numerous threats that have escalated in number and intensity as the Jan. 30 date for scheduled elections in Iraq neared.

Mosul, in northern Iraq, is home to many Kurds and pro-Syrian groups.

Certain Muslim factions were apparently threatening Christians as a way to pressure them "to not align themselves with either the pro-Syrian (groups) or the Kurds," Father Najib said.

To vote or not

Most Catholic leaders in Iraq and especially the Vatican want the Jan. 30 elections for a transitional National Assembly to go ahead as scheduled.

Archbishop Casmoussa told Vatican Radio he did not think this was "the right moment" for elections given the climate of insecurity. He spoke after unidentified Iraqis released him less than 24 hours after kidnapping him Jan. 17.

But Archbishop Filoni said the vote "will be carried out," even though it will not be held "in a normal situation."

Iraqi Prime Minister Iyad Allawi said violence will prevent pockets of Iraqis from voting.

Whether the poll results should be considered valid if large numbers of people do not vote "will need to be seen according to how (the voting process) is carried out," Archbishop Filoni said.

Latin-rite Archbishop Jean Sleiman of Baghdad said Jan. 17 that a substantial number of Christians are "going on vacation" over the election period, "so they have an excuse" not to vote.

Casting a vote is dangerous for the Christian community, he said.

"If they vote, the others will retaliate, but if they don't vote, they will be losing something, too," he said.

One informed Vatican official said the legitimacy of the January elections should be called into question if entire groups sit it out.

"Even in the U.S., 100 percent of the voters don't go to vote. But for example, if all Hispanics or African-Americans decided not to vote, would that simply be an 'imperfect' election? This is the problem," said the official.

Vying for control

More than 62 percent of Iraq's population is Shiite Muslim, while 34 percent is Sunni Muslim, a different branch of Islam.

Under Saddam, power was generally in the hands of the Sunni minority, while Shiite institutions were under strict control, and the mostly Sunni Kurds in the North were persecuted in their drive for autonomy.

A political struggle between Sunni and Shiite groups after elections could pose a real threat to Christians, Archbishop Sleiman said.

"The real danger is in the division. If the Sunni don't share in elections, it will be sure to cause problems," he said.

Sunnis "have to be more realistic. They have to share power; they cannot have it again like before," he said.

Whether elections will lead toward a stable interim government or "worst-case scenario, a civil war," Msgr. Stern said, the church and Catholic donor agencies will continue their work in Iraq.

"I don't envisage any scenario that would totally block the church," he said.

Leave the cell phone in the car, participate in the Mass

Focus should be on God, nothing else

Cell phones! They are so annoying. For countless ages from Adam and Eve to the early 1990s, human beings managed to exist in various conditions of peril, demand and activity without being in constant telephonic contact with one another. So why in the world does everybody from CEOs to teenagers have to be constantly yak, yak, yakking about everything and nothing?

Recently I came back from a trip. In an airport these days, you would think that you have suddenly been transported to a giant mental hospital, a traveling Bedlam. People sit on benches and in snack bars talking into tiny microphones concealed on their persons, but they look like so many schizophrenics talking to themselves.

When the plane lands people make the obligatory three phone calls: One is to say, "Yeah, I've just landed in Atlanta" or wherever; the second, as they wait for their bags, is to say, "Now we are waiting for the bags"; the third call is, "Now I'm going to the car, I'll call you from the car."

Does life really need such play-by-play commentary?

Recently I got off the subway in New York. Coming toward me on the sidewalk was a phalanx of people. Every single one of them was talking to somebody, hand-to-ear or just babbling in the air. These were not the homeless. These were the "connected."

The train going up to New York had a "quiet car" where you were not supposed to talk on the phone. I took refuge there. No sooner was I settled in the seat, contemplating freedom from someone's dinner plans or business affairs, when the phone rang for the woman across the aisle. I shot her a withering gaze.

"My boyfriend," she said, pointing to the phone.

"I don't care," I said, pointing to the "Quiet Car" sign.

In church these phones are most annoying. Why do most people even bring them to church? The whole idea of prayer, whether communal or private, is that we put other things aside to lift our hearts and minds to God.

Last Good Friday one woman got no fewer than three phone calls in the middle of the service of the passion of our Lord.

Like many parishes these days, our church has a sign at the entrance telling people to turn off their cell phones. But people often forget. Phones ring, often at the bottom of some giant suitcase that passes for a purse. It takes a minute to find them.

I have a better solution. Leave the cell phone in the car. You don't need it. Some things are more important than your phone call. Church is one of them.

Of course, some people, such as doctors, emergency medical workers, police officers and firefighters have to be on call. They can put the phone on "vibrate" mode and go outside to answer when summoned.

The rest of us should pay attention to the Mass.

People and priest celebrate the Mass together. The congregation would not want the Mass interrupted by the priest stopping to answer his phone in the middle of the eucharistic prayer or homily. Likewise, their "full and active" participation means no phones.

There's a spiritual principle here. We need to be fully present to God and to each other. We cannot always be thinking that something else, somewhere else is always more important than the person we are with and the situation we are in.

Most of these calls can wait. Hang up the phone, and live life in the here and now. Please God.

The writing on the wall of water

Did God have a role in the disaster?

The Dec. 26 tsunami was more a "wall of water" than a wave. Is there any writing waiting to be read on that wall?

It hit 12 different countries, killed more than 160,000 people, left more than 2 million homeless and destroyed property to an extent never seen before. It also raises in the minds of many this question: How could an all-powerful, wise and loving God let something like this happen?

Is God sending a message to the world in the harsh language of this disaster?

I don't pretend to be able to answer that question, but it has been on my mind. Letting it slip out here into print might clarify some issues, but it can also confuse a believing mind. Doubt does not disqualify anyone from the community of believers, but in the face of the greatest natural disaster we've ever seen I find myself repeating the words the father of the possessed boy spoke to Jesus in Mark 9:24, "Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief."

Was God there when disaster struck?

God is everywhere. So, yes, God was there when the fateful waters rolled.

Did God cause this disaster to happen?

No.

Why, then, didn't God prevent it from happening?

Who can say? Who knows the mind of God?

Is God trying to tell us something? Maybe.

The message, faith assures us, surely would be one of love. Love for the victims, who, our faith would want to persuade us, somehow were swept with baptismal force into the arms of a waiting, welcoming Creator. Love also for the rest of us survivors worldwide, who in response to God's love can now show ourselves to possess a faith, hope and love strong enough to sustain the generosity, resourcefulness and commitment needed to rebuild South Asia.

in the Pacific Ocean.

Those of us on my side of the globe can begin thinking of ourselves more frequently and consistently as global citizens with responsibilities toward those on the other side of the world with whom we share the same human nature. We might now be more inclined to share our wealth and technology without diluting culture here or there, and certainly without dominating those who are down.

We will, I suspect, dutifully pay our respects to the distinction between the positive and permissive wills of God, acknowledging that God did not strike, a natural disaster did.

Why and to what purpose, then, did God, the Creator of all things natural, permit it?

I can't say and don't know anyone who can.

Depending on the quality and quantity of our response worldwide, we might come to see ourselves as somehow better off for the experience: larger of heart, more fully human, participants in a consciousness of human solidarity never known before.

But the evidence for that will have to be measurable. It will have to become visible in terms of peace, justice, economic development and love for one another.

There is now so much evidence to the contrary in our world that hope is strained and faith is stretched.

St. Basil the Great said, "Sin is the misuse of powers given us by God for doing good." How we use our power now has something to say about the prospects for our own salvation.

Confirmation before marriage

Q. Is the sacrament of confirmation necessary before one can be married in the Catholic Church? (Ohio)

A. Catholics who are not yet confirmed should receive that sacrament before they are married if it can be done without serious inconvenience. (Canon 1065).

However, it is not advisable to rush into confirmation simply to get it done before marriage. Before receiving confirmation lawfully, one should be properly instructed and prepared for the sacrament (Canon 889), even if that means delaying it until after one is married.

The politics of abortion

Catholics must 'turn up the heat' to make changes

In the late 1980s while working as special assistant for public policy in an East Coast diocesan Catholic Charities office, I experienced a "baptism of fire" in the politics of abortion.

During that time I worked with a small but dedicated group of pro-life advocates to pass state legislation requiring parental or guardian permission before a minor girl could receive an abortion.

Because minors usually need parental/guardian permission just to get their ears pierced, one would think that passing a law requiring similar permission for a surgical abortion would be a breeze. Not so. In the struggle to protect unborn babies, minors and parental rights, common sense was out.

To counter the powerful campaign propagated by Planned Parenthood and the city's leading newspaper, our little force fought back with a campaign of truth. We contacted all the Catholic pastors, asking them to encourage their parishioners to get actively involved. We prayed. We wrote articles. We met with every legislator.

And we flew in from Chicago a constitutional attorney who represented Americans United for Life to testify before the entire state Legislature.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

We should have won, but we lost. We lost because of Catholic apathy. The overwhelming majority of clergy and laity just didn't care much. Many legislators told me they were not hearing much from constituents who favored the bill.

Until the consciences of millions of American Catholics are aroused to the point of passionate action, 4,000 unborn babies will continue to be murdered brutally through abortion every day. Parental rights will be weakened, and vulnerable women will be harmed — physically, emotionally and spiritually — through the lie of abortion.

Politics is a rough game, especially when it comes to highly divisive issues like abortion. Way back in the '80s, I learned that most politicians do not see the light until they feel the heat.

There's no getting around it: We have got to turn up the heat!

Stay in touch with your state Catholic conference. Learn about the pro-life bills they are promoting. And regularly write, e-mail or call your state legislators urging their full support.

I recently spoke with Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, to find out what legislation is likely to be introduced this session of Congress. He said the "Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act," if passed, would require abortion providers to inform women seeking an abortion that an unborn child of 20 weeks — and possibly younger — feels pain when hurt. And that anesthesia could be given to the child before the abortion.

Doerflinger also mentioned the "Child Custody Protection Act." This bill would make it illegal for adults to transport minor girls across state lines for an abortion in an effort to avoid home state protective laws.

Please contact your two U.S. senators and congressperson, urging them to support the above federal legislation actively. And don't forget the president! After his recent re-election, George Bush said he had earned a lot of "political capital," and that he intended to use it.

Let's turn up the heat on him as well, and insist that he spend a significant amount of that capital on the unborn. (The White House comment desk's phone: 202-456-1111; fax: 202-456-2461).

Repeated call to be saved shows trust in God, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

Even in misery, we can count on the Lord, says pope

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The prayer, "O Lord, save me," repeated in the Psalms, in the New Testament and in the lives of modern believers is an acknowledgment that God is the only one who can save people, Pope John Paul II said.

"Authentic trust always sees God as love, even if at times we find it difficult to understand fully his actions," the pope said Jan. 26 at his weekly general audience.

During the gathering in the Vatican audience hall, Pope John Paul looked at the "deadly nightmare" described in Psalm 116 and in the psalmist's praise for God who heard him and saved him.

In the psalm, "the image is that of a prey caught in the trap of an inescapable hunter," the pope said. Risking death, the psalmist also experiences "psychological pain" and says, "I fell into distress and sorrow."

"But from that tragic abyss a cry was launched toward the only one who could extend a hand and snatch the anguished supplicant from that inextricable tangle," the pope said.

The psalmist cried, "O Lord, save me," and the Lord, "invoked with faith, extended his hand, cut the ropes that bound the supplicant, dried the tears in his eyes and stopped his precipitous slide into the hellish abyss," the pope said.

The psalmist "returns to the land of the living," praising God for his loving tenderness, he said.

The pope said the psalm reminds believers that "in misery and abandonment one can always count on the Lord, the father of orphans and the defender of widows."

A sad day each year

The March for Life is a strange combination of sorrow and joy

The sorrow comes because we commemorate a Supreme Court decision that, although it lacks all authentic validity, continues to allow the destruction of more than a million children a year. Yet the joy comes because we gather with thousands of other pro-life activists, proudly taking part in the greatest human rights cause of our day, and we know that our cause will prevail.

While it is important to march, we should also understand that the March for Life is, at its core, an educational effort about the "Life Principles." Miss Nellie Gray, founder and president of March for Life, has always stressed this point and I want to re-echo it.

The Life Principles express, in a succinct way, the absolute inviolability of every physical human life, and the fact that such a life has a right to protection regardless of the circumstances of its conception. The Life Principles are about equality — the equality of the born with the unborn, the healthy with the sick, the strong with the weak, the adult with the embryo.

One of the Life Principles states, "The life of each human being shall be preserved and protected from that human being's biological beginning when the father's sperm fertilizes the mother's ovum."

This formulation protects us from the linguistic tricks some play when they re-define "conception" or speak in abstract terms about their philosophy of when a human being becomes a person. The fact is that every biological, living human being is a human person.

The March for Life, as an educational effort, has a theme every year, and this year's theme emphasized that it is the duty of each American to uphold the Life Principles without exception or compromise.

Our duty to these children is absolute and admits no exceptions. Although it is legitimate to work step by step, incrementally, toward the protection of every life, it is equally necessary to clearly and frequently articulate where we want to go: to the protection of every life, without exception. The children conceived in rape and incest must have equal protection. The children of mothers with medically complicated pregnancies must have equal protection.

In an excellent analysis of the legitimacy of the incremental approach, Angel Rodriguez Luno, professor of moral theology at Rome's Pontifical University of the Holy Cross, wrote, "the absolute personal opposition to abortion on the part of the lawmaker [must be made] known to all, thus preventing any confusion or scandal." Leaders in the pro-life movement must, with even greater reason, avoid the scandal that can unintentionally arise if people think that we are granting moral legitimacy to even a single abortion.

We are not; we never can. The sad commemoration that comes every January is a good time to reaffirm that fact.

Father Pavone is the national director of Priests for Life.

WARNING BEFORE THE WAVES

Indian bishop says earthquake before tsunamis was 'God's alarm'

BY ANTO AKKARA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PORT BLAIR, India — The powerful Indian Ocean earthquake that preceded the tsunamis was "God's alarm," said Bishop Aleixo das Neves Dias of Port Blair, which encompasses India's Andaman and Nicobar Islands where more than 7,500 people were believed to have died.

"God has mysterious ways of communicating with his people. I feel that the earthquake was God's alarm," Bishop Dias told Catholic News Service in a Jan. 22 interview.

Most of the islanders who escaped the gigantic waves that flooded the flat islands "were alerted by the earthquake," the bishop said.

Bishop Dias visited the Triad-area of the Diocese of Charlotte in August 2004 as part of a missionary trip.

"We were getting ready to go to church (Dec. 26) when the earthquake began," recounted Rajini Tirkey, a Catholic housewife from Campbell Bay, near the southernmost tip of the Andaman Islands.

"Soon there were craters all around, and water started flushing out like fountains," said told CNS when she came to meet Bishop Dias and collect rosaries for her children.

Sensing danger, the men kept watching the sea while the women and children from Catholic families in the village got together to pray.

"When they saw the huge waves coming, they shouted, and all of us ran to the jungle," recalled Tirkey.

Though she and her three children, ages 6 to 11, were submerged when the waves overtook them twice, Tirkey said they were lucky to survive.

But, when the water receded after four days, 28 bodies that could not be identified were found; other members of the village's 50 families were missing.

Tirkey said her house "has become sea. You can go and fish there now."

"Besides our houses, there is no trace of our church, too," added Tirkey, who was airlifted by the Indian Air Force to Port Blair a week after the disaster.

Some other Campbell Bay residents — like M. John, his wife and seven children — live in a relief camp at a Catholic school in Port Blair.

"It is God's blessing we are alive today. Had the earthquake not been there, we would have rushed out of the houses, and the sea would have swallowed us," said John, a government contractor who said the tsunamis had left him a pauper.

John's house disappeared into the sea, while the 4,000 coconut trees in his 14-acre grove are submerged in seawater and soon will decay.

"We are penniless now. We do not know what to do next," said John, while his wife left to collect clothing for their children from the bishop's office.

John and his wife hoped to get Bishop Dias' help: John's name was missing in the government list of refugees, although the family had lived in the camp for three weeks.

Inside the camp, John spends the day reading newspapers and meeting every government official who visits. He is eager to find out the government's compensation and rehabilitation plans for the tsunami victims.

He said that following a powerful 1982 earthquake the government did not keep its promise to compensate the islanders.

Missionaries of Charity clean up around homes damaged by the tsunami in Kanniyakumari, located on the most southern tip of India, Jan. 7. The World Health Organization said in early January that the 226,000 death toll from the earthquake-triggered tsunamis could rise if groups can't help stem the spread of dysentery and cholera.

"The fact that the government is not even prepared to admit the actual casualty figures makes me suspect the (government) promises," added John, who migrated to the island from India's southern Kerala state three decades ago.

Andaman and Nicobar is an archipelago of 550 islands spread more than 500 miles from north to south in the Bay of Bengal and Indian Ocean. Only 40 of the islands are inhabited.

Christians account for 23 percent of the 350,000 people of the remote islands, the closest of which is less than 200 miles from Indonesia's Sumatra island.

ROME — As soon as news of Pope John Paul II's hospitalization spread beyond Vatican City, journalists based in Rome flocked to Gemelli Hospital to cover the story.

What looked like a forest of camera tripods and satellite antennae quickly sprouted up outside the Rome hospital Feb. 2.

Well-wishers and pilgrims added to the media crowd, with all eyes and lenses focused on the 10th floor, where the pope has his own private room.

Only Vatican officials and Rome VIPs were allowed access to the hospital's upper levels to relay their wishes for the pope's full recovery from respiratory complications from the flu.

Iraqi church officials laud country's election

BY CAROL GLATZ

ROME — Every Iraqi who cast a vote on Jan. 30 amid continued chaos and violence showed that democracy will win over terrorism, said a top Iraqi church official.

"This is a big lesson to terrorism, a great message that says we are not afraid" of terrorists and "we will rebuild our country," said Father Philip Najim, the Rome-based representative of the Chaldean-rite Baghdad Patriarchate.

The greater-than-expected voter turnout is "a positive sign" as it marks a turning point in Iraq's future, he said.

"It shows the whole world how educated the Iraqi people are and that we are capable of reaching freedom and democracy," the Iraqi-born priest told Catholic News Service Jan. 31.

Maryknoll nun prepares for prison stay after SOA trespass conviction

MARYKNOLL, N.Y. (CNS) — Maryknoll Sister Leila Mattingly is going to jail. She just does not know precisely when. But when she does go, it will be for six months.

Sister Mattingly, 63, was sentenced Jan. 25 to six months in prison following her misdemeanor trespassing conviction for stepping over the property line during a 16,000-strong protest in November 2004 at Fort Benning, Ga., home to the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation, once known as the School of the Americas.

The institute is a training facility for foreign military personnel. For the past 14 years, it has been the site of annual protests by demonstrators who link its graduates to human rights abuses committed over the past two decades by government security forces in Latin America.

According to the U.S. government, only a small number of those who have attended the institute were ever involved in criminal activities.

"I believe that I followed my conscience and my sense of moral outrage by prayerfully and peacefully protesting," Sister Mattingly said at her sentencing hearing in Columbus, Ga.

"I crossed the line because of what the school teaches, what many of its students have done, and what it represents in the madness of military rationale that might makes right," she told U.S. Magistrate G. Mallon Faircloth, judge of the U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Georgia.

Sister Mattingly was the oldest woman, and the only woman religious, among the 14 people charged for civil disobedience during the Nov. 20-21, 2004 protests. She and Alice Gerard of Buffalo, N.Y., received the longest prison sentences.

According to School of the Americas Watch, more than 170 people have received prison time totaling more than 75 years for their actions at protests over the past decade.

In 1971, Sister Mattingly was assigned to a Maryknoll mission in Bolivia soon after a coup by Gen. Hugo Banzer Suarez.

"His military chased, grabbed, shot, killed, imprisoned and tortured thousands during his seven years of dictatorship," Sister Mattingly said.

SOA visitors, she added, "may have seen Gen. Suarez's picture there in its hall of fame! Can you imagine what an insult that is to the beautiful people of Bolivia who suffered terribly under his tyrannical regime?"

Sister Mattingly was to receive a letter from the Bureau of Prisons notifying her of the prison to which she must report and the date when her sentence begins. Protesters sentenced in the past have received the notice anywhere from six to 12 weeks after their trials.

Court declines to hear case that rejected 'Choose Life' auto plates

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Supreme Court Jan. 24 declined to hear a case over whether states can offer license plates with anti-abortion slogans.

Without comment, the court declined to take an appeal of a ruling that said South Carolina's program offering pro-life license plates was unconstitutional. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had said it was unconstitutional for the state to offer plates with the saying "Choose Life" because supporters of legal abortion were not given the chance to have a license plate expressing a different view.

Planned Parenthood of South Carolina said in a lawsuit that the state had engaged in "viewpoint discrimination" because the program allowed only one side of the debate about abortion to have access to the license plate forum.

Under a 2001 law, South Carolina began offering specialty plates for additional fees of up to $70.

The 4th Circuit is not the only federal appeals court to have taken up a case over "Choose Life" plates. The 5th Circuit Court said in 2002 that supporters of legal abortion had no legal standing to sue over Louisiana's "Choose Life" plates.

In material filed with its case, South Carolina said 11 other states offer "Choose Life" plates and 11 other states are considering them.

U.S. observance of World Day for Consecrated Life set for Feb. 6

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. celebration of World Day for Consecrated Life will be held Sunday, Feb. 6, across the nation.

The Vatican-sponsored event, instituted in 1997 to pay tribute to religious men and women around the world, was observed in Rome Feb. 2.

According to Vatican statistics, the number of men and women members of religious orders totals about 986,000.

FROM THE VATICAN

New Vatican yearbook shows growth of church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As Pope John Paul II took a rare sick day, he was given a thick tome to thumb through: the first copy of the 2005 "Annuario Pontificio," the Vatican yearbook.

The book was delivered to the pope Jan. 31, a day the pope suspended his appointments because of the flu, said Joaquin Navarro-Valls, the Vatican spokesman.

Initial figures from the book compiled by the Vatican's statistics office contained some good news:

— The world's Catholic population grew from 1.07 billion in 2002 to 1.08 billion in 2003.

— The number of Catholics in Africa grew by 4.5 percent; in Asia by 2.2 percent; in Oceania by 1.3 percent; in North and South America by

1.2 percent. Europe reported "a situation of practical stability."

— 49.8 percent of the world's Catholics live in North and South America.

— An increase in the number of diocesan priests led to an increase in the overall number of priests in the world, despite the fact that religious orders of men reported fewer ordained members.

— The total number of priests grew from 405,058 in 2002 to 405,450 in 2003. There were 707 more diocesan priests, while there were 315 fewer religious order priests.

— The pope named 171 bishops in 2004. He established 10 new dioceses and one new apostolic vicariate. Six dioceses became archdioceses.

Vatican praises woman who refused cancer treatment to save child

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican praised an Italian woman who sacrificed her life for her unborn child, calling it an act of "love and faith."

A 41-year-old woman from northern Italy died Jan. 24 from skin cancer, just three months after giving birth to a healthy baby boy.

Soon after Rita Fedrizzi was diagnosed with melanoma last year, she discovered she was pregnant. She refused doctors' recommendations to abort the fetus and to undergo treatment that would have been harmful to her unborn child.

The Vatican newspaper,

L'Osservatore Romano, headlined its Jan. 26 story about Fedrizzi "A gesture of love and faith in order to let life win."

The decision to forgo treatment knowing she would most likely die as a result was not made without "a heavy heart" or with "superficiality," said the paper.

"She informed herself ... and she knew clearly that if she were to give birth she would not have had any hope of surviving" the disease, it said.

The woman's husband, Enrico Fontana, said his wife had told the doctors that carrying out an abortion would have been like "killing one of my other two children to save my skin."

Fedrizzi made "a choice based on her faith, which I always shared with her," Fontana said.

The Vatican paper called her sacrifice "a courageous gesture."

The article recalled "another act of courage and love toward life" with the example of St. Gianna Beretta Molla, also from northern Italy.

St. Gianna died in 1962 after refusing treatment for a tumor so that she could carry her unborn child to term. Pope John Paul II beatified her in 1994 and proclaimed her a saint May 16, 2004.

Wings of peace

Pope John Paul II looks at one of two white doves released by children from the window of his private apartment at the Vatican Jan. 30. During an annual appeal for peace, the pontiff prayed that the younger generations would become "courageous and tenacious constructors of peace." The pope enjoyed a laugh with the children when he tried to release the doves because they just settled on the window sill. When he picked one up to launch it into the air, it turned around and flew back into the window. The pope grinned widely and threw up his hands in defeat.

The same day, the pope came down with the flu and was taken to Gemelli hospital, where he has been treated in the past, as a precautionary measure. When the pope had appeared at his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square to lead the Sunday noon Angelus Jan. 31, his voice was hoarse.

For more on the pope's condition, see the story on page 1.

Discussing non-violence

Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, serves as guest speaker during an Interfaith Weekend event held at St. John Baptist de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro Jan. 14-15. Emphasizing Jesus' vision of his community as found in Matthew's Gospel, Father Kloster listed 10 principles derived from the words and actions of Jesus, including the all-inclusiveness of the church, the practice of the servant mode of action rather than the mode of dominance and power, and the attitude and practice of non-violence.

Father Vincent Erb dies at 82

FLOURTOWN, Pa. — Father Vincent Ignatius Erb, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, died Jan. 26. He was 82.

A funeral Mass for Father Erb, who was residing at St. Joseph's Villa in Flourtown, Pa., was held Feb. 1, with internment following at Holy Sepulchre Cemetery.

Father Erb served in parishes across the country, but the majority of his service was in the region of North Carolina that became the Diocese of Charlotte in 1972.

Father Erb was ordained in Wilmington by the late Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh on May 18, 1950. After a few months on duty with the Home Mission Apostolate at Sacred Heart Church in Whitesville, Father Erb was appointed as parochial vicar at St. Benedict Church in Greensboro. He also served as parochial vicar for churches in Jacksonville and Durham before being appointed pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Brevard in June 1954.

In January 1957, Father Erb became pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville, where he served until September 1965. After several months in residence at St. Bernadette Church in Goldsboro, Father Erb became pastor of St. Therese Church in Mooresville.

Over the next few years, Father Erb served as pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton, St. Pius X Church (now St. Philip the Apostle Church) in Statesville and Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy.

Father Vincent Erb

In November 1980, Father Erb returned to Greensboro as pastor of St. Benedict Church. His health began to fail while serving at there and, after a period of residence at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, Father Erb was granted early retirement for health reasons on July 1, 1984. After retirement, Father Erb made his home in Willow Grove, Pa.

Father Erb is survived by a niece and nephew, great nieces and a great nephew.

"LAST KISS" by Rich Staley

Now available at Carolina Catholic Bookshoppe and Borders at Stonecrest

"Last Kiss" by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. 'Last Kiss' is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

AROUND THE DIOCESE

Opting for coffee with a difference

contributes to sustainable development by offering better trading conditions to, and securing the rights of, marginalized producers and workers — especially in the global South."

Fair Trade is part of the CRS Coffee Project.

"The CRS Coffee Project is an education, advocacy, and consumer initiative developed in partnership with the Interfaith Coffee Program of Equal Exchange," CRS's Web site states. "The project provides a concrete way for Catholics in the United States to live their faith in solidarity with coffee, tea and cocoa producers in Latin America, Africa and Asia who suffer as a result of unfair trade practices."

Mary Joyce and Vernon Dixon, and Pat and Joan Mahan are Immaculate Heart of Mary Church's Fair Trade coffee coordinators. At St. William Church, coordinators are Lois Miller, Pat Bryson and Judith McBrier.

Mary Joyce told parishioners at the end of the Jan. 9 Mass at St. William Church that $100 billion worth of coffee is sold worldwide each year, but that small growers receive little money for their crops, sometimes 30 cents or less per pound. However, Equal Exchange, a company that is in partnership with CRS and buys coffee directly from growers, guarantees them a minimum of $1.20 to $1.30 per pound. If the market price rises above that, Equal Exchange pays growers the higher price.

"I've been in a number of countries in Latin America and have seen the people who pick the coffee," said Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church and Immaculate of Heart of Mary Church.

"It's very hard work," he said. "They don't get paid very much, and there are only a limited number of weeks a year when they can work. Buying Fair Trade coffee will make a real difference in their lives."

"Through Equal Exchange, small-scale farmers can sell their coffee directly (avoiding middlemen), receiving a fair price, affordable credit and a long-term trading partner," Dixon said. "By serving (the coffee) at fellowship hour and other events, we can help support these farmers as they build a better future for their families and their communities."

"Fair trade practices help build pride, independence and community empowerment for small farmers and their families," CRS states. "A coffee processing plant in El Salvador, community stores in Colombia, the training of doctors and nurses in Mexico, reforestation programs in Costa Rica, new schools in Peru — these are all examples of the initiatives that co-ops have taken in their own communities with the income from fair trade."

How did the two parishes get involved?

"Vernon and I have a peace and social justice group that meets in our home," Mary Joyce said. "We came to a Pax Christi meeting and learned Father (Kloster) was encouraging the pastoral councils to do this. It's absolutely wonderful to have the support of your pastor."

Fair Trade's organic, shade-grown coffee is environmentally friendly.

Equal Exchange says that its "organic coffees are grown by farmers who manage the soil in a sustainable agricultural system promoting natural cycles and controls, rather than chemical pesticides and fertilizers, to develop the beans to their fullest potential."

"Shade-grown" means that farmers don't cut native trees to plant more coffee trees.

"A typical shade-grown farm is made up of coffee trees grown alongside other food crops under a canopy of taller trees," Equal Exchange says. "These taller trees provide fruit, wood and other valuable products to the farmer while offering protection and nutrients to the coffee plants and preventing erosion to the soil."

These farming methods and the higher prices paid to farmers mean that fairly traded coffee is somewhat more expensive than more familiar commercial brands. Sold at cost at St. William Church, regular coffee was $5 a 12-ounce bag; decaf was $6 per 12-ounce bag.

"It's true that drinking Fair Trade coffee will cost you more than your present brand, but in more than one way it's putting your money where your mouth is," Dixon said.

St. William parishioners Don and Rosie Stillwagon tried the coffee brewed in the parish hall and ordered several bags of beans.

"It was very good, very robust," Don Stillwagon said. "I've been looking for this coffee. I heard about it at a bird conservatory in Alaska that promoted Fair Trade coffee because it preserves the trees for the birds."

"I see no sense in buying $8-, $10- or $12-a-pound gourmet coffee when we can get this," he said.

FEMINISTS AGAINST ABORTION

Speaker to bring unique pro-life message to diocese

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Serrin Foster, president of Feminists for Life of America, will present "The Feminist Case Against Abortion" in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Foster will give her acclaimed speech at three locations — Belmont Abbey College Feb. 15, the University of North Carolina at Charlotte Feb. 16 and Davidson College Feb. 17. The talks, sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte, diocesan Catholic Campus Ministry and Belmont Abbey, are free and open to the public.

Since 1994, Foster has served at Feminists for Life of America, a pro-life organization based in Washington.

Founded in 1972, Feminists for Life is a national non-sectarian, grassroots organization that continues the efforts of the early American feminists, including Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, to systematically eliminate the root causes that drive women to abortion by facilitating practical solutions.

Foster is widely recognized as an international spokesperson for pro-life feminism.

Foster's speech, "The Feminist Case Against Abortion," was published in the anthology Women's Rights, which is one volume in a series of "Great Speeches in History." In her speech, Foster addresses 200 years of pro-life feminism and explains how the modern women's movement came to support abortion.

The early feminists were pro-life, said Foster.

"Abortion is contradictory to feminism," she said. "The more you know about the remarkable women who set the first examples, the more you will see why you can be pro-life and pro-women."

Foster also will examine "solutions for today" and "how to help women create a world that supports women, honors fathers and protects children."

"I am still asked if Feminists for Life is an oxymoron, but there's nothing more consistent than supporting women and children, rejecting violence and exploitation," she said.

"Serrin Foster and Feminists For Life of America are reclaiming true feminism by exposing the lie of the modern feminist movement: that in order for women to have equal access to education and equality in the workplace, women must deny who they are, choose against their children and embrace abortion," said Cindy Brown, executive director of Room at the Inn, a Catholic maternity home in Charlotte.

"Modern feminists ironically insult women with their chauvinistic position that women must be like men in order to contribute to society — for instance, non-child bearers — and that pregnancy renders a woman mentally incompetent and unable to continue her education or maintain her job performance in the workplace," said Brown.

As one of the participants in a Jan. 23 panel discussion, "Abortion and the American Woman," at The Catholic University of America, Foster agreed with her fellow panelists that the pro-life movement, which has long emphasized the defense of the unborn, is now also stressing the harm that abortions can cause upon women.

"Abortion is contradictory to feminism."

In the abortion debate, said Foster, it's "so easy to scream and get into corners," with people on both sides focusing on divergent points of view, instead of really looking at the women who find themselves at the center of this debate without the support or resources to see any alternatives.

"It's important to reach them now, so we can help create a world where we focus on helping women instead of eliminating people," said Foster.

"I encourage people to attend these speaking events to learn how the early feminists ... condemned abortion in the strongest terms," said Brown, "and how the two men who founded NARAL Pro-Choice America (formerly known as the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League) advocated the repeal of feminist anti-abortion laws and convinced the leaders of N.O.W. that without abortion, women could not achieve equal access to education, employment and career advancement."

WANT TO GO?

Serrin Foster will speak in Grace Auditorium at Belmont Abbey College in Belmont, 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, Feb. 15; in Room 112 of the Cone Center at UNC-Charlotte, 7:30 p.m. on Wednesday, Feb. 16; and in Tomlinson Residence Hall at Davidson College, 7 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 17.

Journalists, well-wishers flock to hospital

Pope John Paul was hospitalized late Feb. 1 after he experienced serious difficulty breathing.

As the number of journalists crammed into the hospital foyer mushroomed by late morning Feb. 2, guards were called in to keep them from wandering around the hospital.

The pope's condition stabilized Feb. 2 and he was able to concelebrate Mass from his hospital bed, the Vatican spokesman said.

"The Holy Father was able to rest for several hours during the night; he was able to sleep," Joaquin Navarro-Valls told reporters about 12 hours after the pope was taken by ambulance to the hospital.

A Vatican official close to the pope told Catholic News Service Feb. 2 that "everything was calm, there was no panic" in the Vatican when the pope experienced difficulty breathing.

"They took him to the hospital just to make him more comfortable," the official said. "He needs to rest for a few days in order to recover."

Navarro-Valls told reporters the doctors had confirmed "the diagnosis of acute laryngeal tracheitis with episodes of laryngeal spasms."

He said the pope's "cardiorespiratory and metabolic" functions "are within normal limits," although the pope did have a "slight fever" in the morning.

Beyond saying that the pope received "respiratory assistance" upon arriving at the hospital at 10:50 p.m., Navarro-Valls would not specify the treatment the pope was receiving.

When asked if the pope had to undergo a tracheotomy, when a hole is cut in the trachea to assist breathing, Navarro-Valls said, "absolutely not."

The spokesman said the pope did not lose consciousness when he was having trouble breathing Feb. 1, but obviously the episode "was sufficiently serious" that his personal physician, Dr. Renato Buzzonetti, decided hospitalization was advisable.

The spokesman said that the pope was doing well enough at 10:15 a.m. to begin concelebrating Mass with his private secretaries.

Later Feb. 2, Navarro-Valls told Vatican Radio the pope would remain in the hospital for a few more days.

Navarro-Valls had said that the pope began showing symptoms of the flu Jan. 30 and cancelled his appointments for Jan. 31.

Then, Feb. 1 Navarro-Valls said the flu was continuing its natural progression, leading the pope to cancel his appointments for Feb. 1-2 as well.

In his final public appearance before he was hospitalized, the pope appeared in his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square to lead the Sunday noon Angelus. His voice was hoarse, but it did not stop him from greeting visitors in the square below.

It was only the seventh time in 26 years that the pope returned to the Rome hospital room reserved for his use.

Although the 84-year-old pope suffers from a disease thought to be Parkinson's, no longer walks in public and often has trouble speaking and breathing, he has not required hospitalization since 1996.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the pope was in the room normally reserved for him, not in intensive care.

While the surgeries may be considered routine by modern medical standards, they were exceptional moments in papal history. No modern pontiff had ever gone to a hospital; as late as 1967, when Pope Paul VI needed prostate surgery, the doctors performed it inside the Vatican.

The Vatican has been more open about Pope John Paul's health problems, but it has never divulged the details of treatment for his neurological disease or even officially confirmed that it is Parkinson's, although individual cardinals have referred to it as such.

There is no cure for Parkinson's, a fact that has fueled speculation about whether the pope might eventually choose to retire instead of serving until death.

Pope says attending Sunday Mass essential part of Christian living

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Attending Sunday Mass each week is a sign of a Catholic's fidelity to Christ and an essential part of Christian living, Pope John Paul II said.

"Participating in the Sunday Mass is not only an important obligation, as the 'Catechism of the Catholic Church' says clearly, but, above all, it is a profound need experienced by each of the faithful," he said Jan. 21.

The pope focused on the importance of Sunday Mass during a speech to the Pontifical Commission for Latin America, which met Jan. 18-21 at the Vatican to discuss "Sunday Mass, the Center of Christian Life in Latin America."

The pope told the commission members, "One cannot live the faith without regularly participating in the Sunday Mass, the sacrifice of redemption and the common banquet of the word of God and the eucharistic bread, the heart of Christian life."

Pope John Paul said bishops and priests must find more effective ways to communicate to the faithful the central place Sunday Mass has "in the church and social life of men and women today."

In addition to religious education about the Eucharist and the Mass, he said, pastors must ensure that their celebrations of the liturgy inspire true respect and authentic piety among the faithful.

The celebrant's preparation of the liturgy, the pope said, must include a strong spiritual component that will be reflected in his gestures, his words and his homily.

"Special attention also must be dedicated to the selection and preparation of songs, signs and other resources that enrich the liturgy, always with respect for the established norms," he said.

Eucharistic Adoration

Something wonderful is happening in Charlotte,

Something quiet and hidden and pure,

Something wonderful is happening in Charlotte,

And it's changing hearts for sure. .

Every hour of every day

Catholics come to fall on their knees

Before our Lord in the most Blessed Sacrament,

And their lives are touched with His peace.

"Can you not watch one hour with me?"

Was our Lord's long-ago request;

"Come to me when you're weary and burdened,

And I will give you rest."

Those who trust and believe in His promise

Have found treasures beyond belief,

As they lay all their cares before Him,

And their hearts feel a blessed relief.

So come, all you Catholics of Charlotte,

To the chapel at St. Gabriel's each week;

An hour in prayer with our Lord

Will bring you the peace that you seek.

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 6

Guest Column

FATHER
BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

The ritual of the Mass is divided into two distinct parts: the Liturgy of the Word and the Liturgy of the Eucharist. Each of these is subdivided into smaller parts called rituals or the abbreviated version, "rites." Since the Mass has a structure and character that is universal and formal, the celebrant needs only to follow the directions of the ritual: to read the prayers and perform the actions set out in the Roman Missal.

As we mentioned a few weeks ago, following the sacred ritual allows the freedom of both the celebrant and the congregation to participate in the Mass. And so the Mass begins with a short ritual known as the "Introductory Rites," which include the Sign of the Cross, the formal greeting, the "Penitential Rite," the Gloria and the Opening Collect or Prayer. The purpose of these "Introductory Rites" is to draw us into prayer and to prepare our hearts and minds to listen to God's Word and to participate in his sacrifice.

Last week, we followed the celebrant as he processed into the sanctuary, revered the altar with a kiss and incensed it. The celebrant arrives at the chair. And so the Mass begins.

Notice that the Mass does not begin with the informal greeting by a lector or cantor, welcoming people to the parish. The Mass does not begin with the entrance hymn or the entrance procession. The Mass does not begin with "Good morning" or "Did you catch the game last night?" or "Nice weather we're having!" or other commentary by the celebrant.

Rather, the Mass begins "In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." We begin the Mass as we begin all prayer by addressing God, greeting the Blessed Trinity, through whom and by whom the Mass is celebrated. The Sign of the Cross marks the beginning of the Mass, as well as the end of the Mass with the final blessing.

Although the ritual of the Mass is divided into parts, it is "one single act of worship" (Sacrosanctum Concilium 56). And so, from beginning to end the Mass is accomplished "in the name" of God; it is the opus Dei, the "work of God," which we enter as we begin the Mass.

Beginning with the Sign of the Cross reminds us that we gain access to the Father by virtue of our baptism:

we were introduced to the cross as it was signed upon our foreheads and holy water was poured over our head three times in the name of each person of the Blessed Trinity. Baptism consecrates us as children of the heavenly Father who can now enter into the saving mysteries of the Son accomplished on our behalf.

The Sign of the Cross is used throughout the Mass to bless and consecrate, for it is by the power of the cross of Christ that our redemption was won and our sanctification is completed.

Following the Sign of the Cross, the celebrant greets the congregation, not in his own words, but with words taken from sacred Scripture found in the epistles of St. Paul. There are three options for the priest — either "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all"; "the grace and peace of God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ be with you"; or simply "Dominus Vobiscum" ("The Lord be with you").

Only the bishop says, "Pax Vobiscum" ("Peace be with you"), by virtue of his office as vicar of Christ, recalling the words of our Lord to his apostles after his resurrection.

The congregation responds, "Et cum spiritu tuo," that is, "and with your spirit." "And also with you" is a poor translation of the Latin that is to be corrected in the next few years.

This exchange between the celebrant and the congregation completes the first dialogue of the Mass, expressing the reciprocal conversation between Christ, the head, and the Church, his Mystical Body.

Next week we will complete our discussion of the "Introductory Rites" by examining the "Penitential Rite."

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Iraqi church officials laud elections

Even if polling in some places proved less than perfect, "the most important thing is that the people went; they went despite the violence, the fear and terrorism," he said.

Millions of Iraqis cast their votes Jan. 30 in the country's first democratic election in decades. They voted for a 275-member transitional National Assembly that will eventually choose a new government that will, in turn, elect the country's president and prime minister.

But despite clamped-down security and a daylong ban on most traffic, some 44 people were killed Jan. 30 after insurgents carried out a string of attacks and suicide bombings.

Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel-Karim Delly of Baghdad condemned those who used violence to express their opposition to the vote.

"It's possible to have differing opinions, but some showed it with ferocity, others peacefully," he said.

"Everyone, Christians and Muslims, went to vote as one people," he told the Italian-based missionary news agency Asianews Jan. 31.

"Those who want the best for our country cast a vote," he said.

Chaldean Auxiliary Bishop Shlemon Warduni of Baghdad told Vatican Radio Jan. 31 he was partially satisfied with the election process.

"On the one hand I am certainly satisfied because it means we are going forward with democracy and freedom; but on the other hand, I am not satisfied because not everyone participated," he said.

Early exit polls suggested that in some parts of Iraq a substantial percentage of Sunni Muslims did not vote. More than 62 percent of Iraq's population is Shiite Muslim, while 34 percent is Sunni Muslim, a different branch of Islam.

Under Saddam Hussein, power was generally in the hands of the Sunni minority.

If too many Sunnis opted out of elections, "we will have some difficulties" in forging a united country, said Bishop Warduni.

But most Catholic leaders said they were optimistic a fully democratic process would benefit the whole country no matter what group obtains a majority in the transitional assembly.

Chaldean Archbishop Djibrail Kassab of Basra told Asianews that "Christians, like all Iraqis, just want a government, a constitution and a democracy."

Father Najim said, "If there is a capable citizen who wants to help build a new Iraq, we will support him" no matter what his religious affiliation may be.

New book celebrates vocations, lives of Poor Clare Sisters

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VICTORIA, Texas — In honor of the 750th anniversary of the life and charism of St. Clare of Assisi, the Mother Bentivoglio Federation of Poor Clare monasteries has released a book titled "Wrapped in Joy: Franciscan Poor Clare Sisters Share Special Stories."

Compiled by Sister Katherine of the Monastery of St. Clare in Victoria, "Wrapped in Joy" is a celebration of the lives and vocations of Poor Clare Sisters throughout the world.

Sister Katherine said she wanted to share the stories of the sisters so that others would be inspired to follow the way of St. Francis and St. Clare in their everyday lives, "walking in the footprints of Jesus."

St. Clare of Assisi

Nearly 100 sisters share inspiring stories of their lives and vocations in "Wrapped in Joy." The stories reflect lives that are diverse in age, experience, personality and background.

And yet, as Father Murray Bodo, a Franciscan priest and scholar, says in a welcome note in the book, "It is God's providence that has brought them together in monasteries across America and throughout the world."

In her introduction, Sister Frances

Teresa writes: "At its very best, Poor Clare life is a generous sharing in the total self-giving of the Trinity."

Sister Frances Teresa is the author of numerous books on Franciscan spirituality.

The stories found in "Wrapped in Joy" reveal much about the lives of St. Francis and St. Clare. The book also features special sections detailing the evangelical life of St. Clare and includes excerpts from her letters.

"From the very beginning, Franciscan spirituality has much to do with stories: the stories of Francis and Clare, the stories they told and wrote down of God's marvelous providence and surprising intervention in their lives," writes Father Bodo.

"The Franciscan story from Francis and Clare until now in the 21st century is filled with stories like those found on the pages of 'Wrapped in Joy,' lovingly gathered: stories of women who have responded to God's call and entered the monastery of St. Clare of Assisi, the first woman Franciscan," he says.

"What is the core story that all their stories partake of? It is the story of Christ, surely, but more specifically it is the story of a way of extending Christ's story, which St. Clare lived and handed down to her sisters," the priest adds.

Forgiveness comes through obedience of Jesus

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

There's a funny paradox that happens when folks make really bad mistakes, especially ones they know they knew better than to make.

Often they then come to believe that God can't possibly forgive them. They knew better. They sinned. Now they deserve whatever God has in store for them as punishment.

We've all seen people in despair because of their actions. The Scriptures have it true to life in Psalm 51 when the psalmist says, "Against you only have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight, [so] that you [God] may be justified in your sentence, vindicated when you condemn."

The psalmist goes on to define what the wrongdoer really wants in his broken, repentant state: "A clean heart create for me, O God, and a steadfast spirit renew within me. Cast me not out from your presence, and your holy spirit take not from me."

In this week's reading from Romans, the Apostle Paul outlines the way this justification before God, this clearing of the slate of offenses, has taken place through the obedience of Jesus.

Referring back to the story of the fall in Genesis, Paul speaks of how Jesus' following all of the Father's instructions leads us there: "To sum up, then: Just as a single offense brought condemnation to all men, a single righteous act brought all men acquittal and life. Just as through one man's disobedience all became sinners, through one man's obedience all shall become just."

We've all seen friends and loved ones desperate for God's forgiveness, unable to forgive themselves, putting up barriers to forgiveness. Yet this is what Jesus came into the world for. He didn't come into the world to save perfect people who always did the right thing. He came to save sinners, people who do the wrong things. And he delights in extending that forgiveness.

You and I so often want to measure out forgiveness to others with thimbles. Jesus wants us to trade our thimbles for buckets or, if we have real courage, to imitate his own generosity and measure out our forgiving love in ocean-sized quantities, washing away all traces of the offenses.

Vatican uncovers screen gems to inaugurate newly restored theater

*Guests shown rare
'Dante's Inferno' reel, other films at inauguration*

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Sifting through thousands of films tucked away in the Vatican Film Library, members of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications dug back in time and picked their oldest and most precious screen gems to show for the grand unveiling of the Vatican's newly restored and modern-equipped cinema.

For the Jan. 20 inauguration of the remodeled theater, invited guests were shown an 1896 reel of Pope Leo XIII and a rare 1910 dramatization of Dante's "Inferno," along with a sneak preview of a new documentary by Italian director Michelangelo Antonioni.

U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, welcomed dozens of special guests, including the council's president emeritus, Cardinal Andrzej Deskur.

The new theater, "Sala Cardinal Deskur," was dedicated to the Polish-born prelate in honor of 50 years of service to the Holy See.

Funding for the complete makeover, which included plush new armchairs, a 19-foot-by-8-foot screen, and a state-of-the-art projector and sound system, came from the Knights of Columbus as well as from the Italian film companies Cinecitta and Istituto Luce.

At the inaugural event, 80-year-old Cardinal Deskur, who is confined to a wheelchair, enjoyed a front-row viewing next to the wheelchair of Antonioni, 92.

Antonioni, known for his films, "L'Avventura" and "Beyond the Clouds," took part in the evening's special screening to offer a sneak-peek showing of his new documentary,

"Michelangelo, Eye to Eye."

The 20-minute film shows Antonioni walking into Rome's St. Peter in Chains Church to gaze at the newly restored marble statue of Moses, sculpted by the 16th-century artist, Michelangelo Buonarroti.

The film captures, in absolute silence, the rapture and respect of the director contemplating, savoring and, in the end, caressing the intricate details and lifelike folds and curves of the imposing statue.

Archbishop Foley said the three films were chosen for the inaugural event because "they represent the importance of cinema in human history, in its aim to be the bearer of culture and mirror of human sensitivity."

At the start of the evening, when the lights went out, the first showing of Pope Leo never appeared on the screen.

Puzzled, Archbishop Foley remarked with a laugh, "Pope Leo has never given us trouble before."

Soon, however, the elderly bespectacled pope came to life on the screen.

In one of the very first motion picture films made soon after the Lumiere brothers invented the modern cam-motion mechanism, Pope Leo is seen sitting with guards and attendants at his side, adjusting his skullcap and blessing the camera.

In another scene, the pope gets off a horse-drawn carriage, walks slowly with his cane to a bench, where he takes off his sun hat, adjusts his glasses and again blesses the camera with long, liquid movements of his frail hand.

The second film of the evening was what once had been the sole remaining copy of the 1910 dramatization of Dante's vision of hell in his first canticle of "The Divine Comedy." "Inferno," the short, silent movie, was the first film to use special effects with modern techniques such as tampering with the film's emulsion to produce what looks like fire raining on writhing sinners.

Archbishop Foley joked it was quite "paradoxical that they would find 'hell' in the Vatican."

Students participate, win in model U.N. program

HIGH POINT — Eight students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point received awards for their participation in a model United Nations program.

The group was among 75 students from Triad-area Catholic schools to take part in the middle school Model U.N. Program, hosted by Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville Jan. 25.

The students, who had researched and written papers on Cyprus and threats to U.N. personnel, were placed into two-person delegations representing Security Council Member nations. They then were divided into groups and spent the day debating and discussing the issues using parliamentary procedures and formal Model U.N. procedures.

At the end of the day, awards were given based upon effective participation and performance.

Students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School to receive awards were eighth-graders Emily Sickelbaugh and Katie Shank, representing France; seventh-grader Jennifer Lindh and eighth-grader Parker Hendrix, representing the United Kingdom and named "Outstanding Delegation"; Alexander Adzima and George Schlaeppli, seventh-graders representing the United States, who received a special moderator-created award for their "outrageously unrealistic, yet awesomely creative" resolution proposal; and eighth-grader Elizabeth Sheffield and seventh-grader Kenneth Kennedy, representing the Russian Federation, who received the "Best Delegation" award for their room as voted on by the other delegates.

Also participating as a delegation from Immaculate Heart of Mary School were seventh-graders Kevin Saxon and Connor Gehling.

Two Charlotte Catholic students compete to be Presidential Scholars

CHARLOTTE — Two students at Charlotte Catholic High School were chosen as candidates for the Presidential Scholars award.

Melissa Brzycki and Matthew Lail, both seniors at Charlotte Catholic, were among the 40 students selected from North Carolina.

They will compete to be included among 500 national semifinalist in June and then compete to be one of 141 potential Presidential Scholars, one of the nation's highest honors for high school students. The winning students will receive Presidential Scholars medallions during a ceremony sponsored by the White House.

The Presidential Scholars Program was established in 1964 by Executive Order of the President to recognize and honor some of the nation's most distinguished graduating high school students. In 1979, the program was expanded to recognize students who demonstrate exceptional talent in the visual, creative and performing arts.

"The Scholars are chosen on the basis of their accomplishments in many areas — academic and artistic success, leadership and involvement in school and the community," said Melissa Apostolides, executive director of the U.S. Department of Education's Commission on Presidential Scholars.

Up to 141 students are named annually as Presidential Scholars. Students may become Presidential Scholars based on two paths of accomplishment: the majority are selected on the basis of broad academic achievement; approximately 20 students are selected on the basis of academic and artistic scholarship in the visual arts, performing arts or creative writing.

Fourth-graders at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte recently took an imaginary trip to a hospital operating room thanks to St. Gabriel Church parishioner Dr. Thomas Zweng, a member of Charlotte Surgical Group. After reviewing human body systems, Zweng distributed props — shoe and head covers for nurses and doctors, surgical gloves and masks — to the students for them to assist with the removal of gall bladder. Using various tools and instruments, the students, as well as teacher Denise Heskamp and Vice Principal Anna O'Brien, followed Zweng through the pretend operation. "The students were attentive, well behaved and asked thought-provoking questions," said Zweng.

The best meal on a cruise ship

Onboard priests bring God sailing

SOMEWHERE IN THE CARIBBEAN — Dinner aboard the Mariner of the Seas cruise ship recently included chilled peach soup, Caesar salad, lobster, prime rib and a hazelnut soufflé for dessert. But after a week's worth of gargantuan meals such as that, I found that the best meal on the ship started out as a thin slice of bread that was transformed into a banquet by a priest from Maryland.

Jesus Father Sal Jordan is pastor of St. Ignatius Church in Port Tobacco, Md. Along with some of his parishioners, Father Jordan was on his first cruise. As bad luck would have it, he picked a difficult one. The weather was windy and chilly for two days and the 12-foot seas the ship rolled through on its way to the Caribbean caused him to experience seasickness.

Like myself and most of the other 3,400 passengers onboard this huge ship, Father Jordan was on vacation. I enjoyed being in a place that was far away from the media hype that is a part of my everyday experience. For Father Jordan, a native of Puerto Rico, it was a chance to get away from the cold weather for a few days.

Royal Caribbean makes an effort to have a minister, preferably a Catholic priest, onboard each of its 29 ships every week. Priests are preferred over other ministers because they can lead a non-denominational service and celebrate Mass while other ministers can only offer the non-denominational service. In return for a free stateroom, the priest is asked to celebrate daily Mass, offer a ministerial ear to anyone who wants to talk and lead a non-denominational service for the crew. That makes it a busman's holiday for a priest but Father Jordan was delighted.

"I usually say several Masses, so this was very relaxing," he said. "Plus, I got to meet so many wonderful people."

But the rough seas took their toll on Father Jordan.

"There was one Mass where I may have looked a little gray and I think I was holding the altar with one hand during the consecration," he said.

Despite how Father Jordan may have felt, he was a cheerful messenger of the Lord who included a brief homily in each of his Masses. In the luxurious surroundings of the ship, he reminded us of the tsunami victims and how they and many others are in need of our prayers and assistance.

Because of the ship's rocking motion, the captain requested a change in the order of the Mass. To keep us from falling down during the service, we were asked to remain seated during the Gospel readings and the consecration. And, because of a flu outbreak onboard, a friendly wave or other gesture was substituted for the Sign of Peace handshake.

When you think about it, the giant cruise ships that prowl the Caribbean during the cold winter months represent an ultimate in technology, comfort and luxury. Everything was spotlessly clean and there was so much good food to eat that my jaws got tired from all the chewing. Cruising is a good vacation value, but it isn't cheap and, if you can afford the luxury of a cruise vacation, you have a lot for which to be thankful.

But how do you express those thanks? For Father Jordan and many others, the best opportunity was at sunrise and sunset.

"I remember a sunset," he said, "I was sitting with some lady passengers from Panama. We were admiring the view and praying as the sun went down. To me, that speaks of God and of nature."

It was beautiful and it was idyllic to combine the Lord's spirit with a nice vacation.

The elusiveness of spiritual happiness

Joy is the fruit of compassion

"Happiness is a butterfly Which when pursued is just out of grasp
But if you will sit down quietly,
May alight upon you."
— Nathaniel Hawthorne

Divine joy is like an elusive butterfly. The desire to catch it is strong, but too much activity will chase it away. Patience is more effective than frantic pursuit.

This is also true when it comes to the human hunger for God. Pope John Paul II spoke of the great human desire to touch God in some way. "It is a need," he said, "that can be as physical as the need for food and water."

At a general audience April 26, 2002, the pope addressed the pilgrims with these words: "Just as the arid land is dead until irrigated by rain, so the faithful yearn for God in order to exist in joyful communion with him."

It is precisely in our intimate relationship with divine life that we find this joy, but more often than not the ability to appreciate it eludes us. Everyone who has faith is capable of receiving the gift of God's eternal joy, but unless they show patience with God they may be frustrated.

Nonbelievers do not have the ability to sense any sign of God's presence in the church. The church for them is an enigma, not a genuine carrier of divine love. They see only the outer shell, the sins and scandals. Then they mock the church and distance themselves from it.

This is understandable, but so foolish. By judging too harshly, and moving too quickly, they sabotage their own best chance for the deep happiness of sacred communion.

Divine joy is the gigantic secret of the church's survival. The church is the mystical body of Christ. Consequently, it has divine life flowing in and through it.

Once you understand the distinction between the human and the divine elements of the church, the joy of the Blessed Trinity will come to you in ways you may have least suspected. Then supernatural joy is yours to relish and share.

Blessed Elizabeth of the Trinity, a 19th-century mystic, once wrote: "The secret of happiness and the secret of all the saints is that they loved God as a friend." To love God as a friend is so simple, and yet so elusive. God is pure mystery.

The saints are the ones who love God best. Despite all the sins of those around them, they focus on love and healing.

To be a saint is to minister to sinners, not denounce them. Those who have brought shame and disgrace to the door of the church are not enemies; they are our children and our responsibility. Jesus gave up his life to save them. The servant is not greater than the master.

"The big problem that confronts Christianity is not Christ's enemies. No, persecution has never done much harm to the inner life of the church. The real problem exists in the souls of those who in their hearts believe in God, and who recognize their obligation to love him and serve him, yet do not!" (Thomas Merton)

We all have the obligation to bring God's healing to others. Joy is the fruit of compassion.

'This is my body'

Familiar words with different results

Did you ever realize that the same four words used by the Lord Jesus to save the world are also used by some to promote abortion? "This is my body." The same simple words are spoken from opposite ends of the universe, with meanings that are directly contrary to each other.

Scripture tells us that on the night before he died to save all people, the Lord Jesus took bread, blessed it, broke it and gave it to his disciples, saying, "This is my body, which is given up for you." He was pointing to what would happen the next day, when he would give that same body on the cross.

He sacrifices himself so that we may live. He gives up his body so that he can destroy the power of sin and death. As a result, he welcomes us into his life, into his kingdom. He makes us members of his body!

On the other hand, abortion supporters say, "This is my body. So don't interfere with it! It's mine, so I can do what I want, even to the point of killing the life within it. All is secondary to my dominion over my body."

In fact one abortion supporter has written: "I say their (pro-lifers') God is worth nothing compared to my body"

Guest Column

(Michelle Goldberg, "Rant for Choice," in the University of Buffalo student newspaper, 1995).

"This is my body." Same words, different results. Christ gives his body away so others might live; abortion supporters cling to their own bodies so others might die. In giving his body, Christ teaches the meaning of love: I sacrifice myself for the good of the other person. Abortion teaches the opposite of love: I sacrifice the other person for the good of myself!

"This is my body." If, indeed, our body is ours, then let's ask the next question: Why? The answer is so that we can give our bodies, our lives, ourselves, away in love to one another and to God. Christ declares, "Do this in memory of me." He calls us to do what he did, and that is precisely how we reverse the dynamic of abortion. Mom and Dad must say to their child, "This is my body, my life, given for you," rather than, "This is my body, my life, so go away!"

Human happiness and fulfillment are never found by pushing other people out of the way. They are found when we push ourselves out of the way. Pope John Paul II says as much in Evangelium Vitae No. 51: He who had come "not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mk. 10:45), attains on the cross the heights of love: "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (Jn. 15:13). And he died for us while we were yet sinners (cf. Rom. 5:8).

In this way, Jesus proclaims that life finds its center, its meaning and its fulfillment when it is given up.

At this point our meditation becomes praise and thanksgiving, and at the same time urges us to imitate Christ and follow in his footsteps (cf. 1 Pt. 2:21).

We, too, are called to give our lives for our brothers and sisters, and thus to realize in the fullness of truth the meaning and destiny of our existence.

"This is my body." It is no accident that the same words are used for such different purposes. A spiritual conflict rages here. We win, in our own lives and in the world, by living these words in self-giving, life-giving love.

Reflections on the inauguration

The Human Side

FATHER
EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

The day before President Bush's second inauguration, I saw two young men at Washington's Union Station holding the sign, "Four More Years of Bush: Have Faith in Jesus."

I was confused. Did the sign mean that we should believe it is the will of Christ that Bush be president or did it mean that only faith in Jesus would help us endure four more years of him?

I laughed at my divided thoughts and how they represent the division our nation is experiencing. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the last two presidential elections. In fact, we live in an age of divisions. Those on the right and the left are more divided than ever. Many of our allies are now at odds with us. And in churches that preach unity we have more differences than agreements.

I believe Inauguration Day should be a time to reflect on what we have learned about life and to thank God for the blessings we have received.

In all reality, there never has been a time in our history when we didn't have differences. Reflecting on divisions during the presidencies of Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses Grant makes today's divisions seem like child's play by comparison.

History shows that division always has been one of our nation's characteristics. Yet, we seem somehow to hold together. Why? Because we are blessed with freedom. If we don't like someone's policies, we are free to vote, march and speak out loudly against them. We know how to function despite divisions.

If divisions spawn corruption, the press and lawmakers tend to find a way to expose that. And if the press and lawmakers aren't truthful, others are there to correct them. Our country is blessed with systems of checks and balances.

My old pastor believed that we always will be blessed because we are a giving nation. We have a very decent track record when it comes to helping poor nations — not just in terms of giving money, but more in terms of our volunteering on behalf of foreign cultures. The love extended by our volunteers abroad is one very big reason we continue to be blessed.

Another reason we are blessed is that we believe in freedom for all. Our military cemeteries honor those who gave their lives for this ideal. As Christ gave his life to free us from our sins, these men and women gave their lives and in a very true way replicate Christ's redemption.

Thanks to inauguration days, we have the opportunity to dwell more on our blessings and less on our divisions.

Communion for Celiac sufferers

Q. More than a year ago, we wrote to you about Communion for our daughter who has celiac disease. You replied that no hosts were available that satisfied the church's requirement for the Eucharist and were also safe for those with this disease.

Our daughter will be ready for her first Communion this coming spring. We read on a celiac Web site that a new form of bread is nearly gluten-free and medically acceptable for Catholic Communion. Is this true? It is something we and many other parents of such children have been desperately hoping for. (Pennsylvania)

A. It is true, and apparently it promises to solve the problem for a host of families.

First, a little background for those who may not be familiar with this physical affliction. Celiac is a disease in which gluten, a protein found in barley, wheat and other cereals, cannot be tolerated.

The disease can be insidious, attacking digestive organs slowly but often with serious consequences. Without a gluten-free diet it may be life-threatening, leading to malnutrition, pancreatic disease, possibly some forms of cancer and a variety of other physical and neurological disorders.

Since awareness and diagnosis of the illness has increased in recent decadec, it has been discovered that about one in every 130 Americans is affected, vastly more than was previously believed.

The special problem for Catholics, of course, is that eucharistic bread must be made from wheat, of which an essential element is gluten. Until recently, no one had found a way to make edible hosts with a sufficiently small amount of gluten safe for celiac sufferers and at the same time liturgically acceptable.

For a long time, the Benedictine Sisters of Perpetual Adoration in Clyde, Mo., have baked Communion hosts for parishes and other institutions. One of the community, Sister Jane Heschmeyer, set out to find a formula that could be used by celiac patients.

With the help of other sisters in her convent, after numerous experiments and consultation with physicians, grain specialists, attorneys and other related experts, a recipe was developed for hosts with a gluten content of only .01 percent.

Dr. Alessio Fasano of the University of Maryland, a Catholic, has researched and written extensively about the disease. He and other medical experts, whose findings have been published in the magazine Gluten-Free Living, regard the new formula as safe for almost all celiac sufferers. Obviously, however, patients should seek the advice of their personal physicians before receiving these hosts in Communion. For some, even this small amount may be unsafe.

One suggested solution has been to receive the Eucharist in the form of wine rather than bread. Parents of some children with the disease have told me, however, that many wines have additives or fermentation products that contain gluten.

Several months ago the new recipe was approved by the Vatican and later by the American bishops for eucharistic use. Families facing this problem might speak with their parish priest. Simple procedures are possible to accommodate children and adults who cannot tolerate the usual wheat hosts.

Information on the altar breads produced by the Clyde Sisters is available from their Web site, www/altarbreadsbenedictinesisters.org, or by calling 1-800-223-2772.

A free brochure answering questions Catholics ask about receiving the Holy Eucharist is available by sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 325, Peoria, IL 61651.

St. Margaret Mary Church — a thriving parish for seven decades

ST. MARGARET MARY CHURCH

SWANNANOVA — The year was 1933 when a connection between Swannanoa and New Bedford, Mass., brought a new migration of Catholics to the North Carolina mountain area called "Grey Eagle" by the native Cherokee. Thanks to that influx of Catholics due to industrial relocation, St. Margaret Mary Church was founded.

A key figure in this migration was Charles D. Owen, whose family's Beacon Manufacturing Company was part of New England's industrial landscape. Owen had purchased a farm in Swannanoa in 1923, and two years later, the plant he had built in western North Carolina to complement the business began operations.

St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa was founded in 1933 to serve the spiritual needs of Catholics emigrating from the North.

In previous years, eastern Buncombe County Catholics — those already settled and those moving into the area — were confronted with a 20-mile roundtrip, mostly on unpaved roads, to go to Mass at St. Lawrence Church (now the Basilica of St. Lawrence) in Asheville. As the roots of Beacon and other industries took hold in the area, the need for a new Catholic church east of Asheville was realized.

In the spring of 1936, Bishop William Hafey of Raleigh purchased a plot of land in the Grovemont subdivision of Swannanoa. Benedictine Father Michael McInerney of Belmont Abbey served as architect, and with funding from a bequest through the Catholic Extension Society, construction of the church and a rectory was underway on the site originally intended as the location for a hotel.

Bishop Hafey dedicated St. Margaret Mary Church in October 1936.

The first pastor was Father Joseph Federal, who later was ordained as bishop of the Diocese of Salt Lake City. The parish boundary was designed to include townships in eastern and southeastern Buncombe County: Oteen, Swannanoa, Black Mountain, Fairview and Broad River. Oteen and Fairview have since been transferred to other parishes.

Sisters from St. Genevieve-of-the-Pines in Asheville offered catechetical instruction for parishioners in the fall of 1936. As the parish grew over the next three decades, the need for more educational space — as well as social and worship room — became evident. In 1965, Msgr. John Manley broke ground for a multipurpose addition which was dedicated by Bishop Vincent S. Waters in 1969. A parking area across the street from the church was donated to the parish soon thereafter.

The Diocese of Charlotte was established in 1972. A year later Bishop Michael J. Begley appointed Atonement Father Pius Keating — after a 30-year Navy career as a Chaplain to the Marine Corps, as pastor of St. Margaret Mary Church. In 2005, Father Keating continues to assist local parishes by saying Mass and hearing confessions. Father Keating was a fellow seminarian in New York and fellow pastor in the Piedmont with Bishop Begley.

Father Keating served as pastor for two decades, extending his pastoral ministry into the ecumenical community. While in Swannanoa, he founded SAGE, the seniors club that became one of the parish's most active groups during Father Keating's pastorate and remains so today.

Father Keating was succeeded in 1994 by Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio. While at St. Margaret Mary Church, Msgr. Marcaccio stressed the involvement of lay ministry and led a renovation effort of the church's interior.

When Msgr. Marcaccio was named priest-secretary for Bishop William G. Curlin in 1995, Father Andrew Latsko assumed the pastorate. He placed special emphasis on service ministries and strengthened the training and implementation of lay ministers. During his pastorate, the Holy Name Men's Club was reactivated, the Ladies' Auxiliary broadened its activities and the youth of the parish were encouraged to actively participate in church life. Father Latsko was a driving force in the formation of the Knights of Columbus Council 13016 in December of 2002.

It was also during Father Latsko's pastorate that a new rectory was purchased for the parish, parking space was expanded and improvements were made to the offices and faith formation classrooms.

In July of 2003, Father Frank Seabo was named parochial administrator of St. Margaret Mary Church. He was installed as pastor in 2004, following the episcopal ordination of Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Father Seabo began celebrating the sacraments and making hospital and home visits in Spanish. In August 2004, St. Margaret Mary Church began offering Mass in Spanish for its Hispanic parishioners. Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament has been expanded to First Friday afternoons throughout the year.

Community outreach includes ministering at the Asheville VA Medical Center. Healing Masses are said monthly at two local nursing homes. Ministry of holy Communion to the homebound serves the bedridden and the aged of the parish. An active RCIA program, adult education, faith formation and other catechetical efforts add to parish life. The parish reaches out to the needy with its own St. Vincent de Paul Chapter, Habitat for Humanity and to local students at schools and colleges studying in the Swannanoa Valley.

The parish will celebrate its 70th anniversary in October 2006. With several founding members who are still in the area, John and Mildred Vallencourt celebrated 70 years of married life at St. Margaret Mary, and George and Opal Lemieux are founding members. Many founding members continue to attend daily Mass into their late 80s and early 90s. There are several families with three and four generations worshipping at the church that they have called home since 1936.

A doctor's perspective on abortion

SHAME, REGRET COMMON AMONG PATIENTS

CHARLOTTE — When Dr. Maureen Kennedy entered medical school, she did so thinking she would be saving lives and helping people. Because she especially enjoyed working with female patients, she found herself drawn to the fields of obstetrics and gynecology.

What began as a mission of healing and bringing life into the world eventually led to a crisis of faith.

While in her first year of residency, Kennedy was required to assist in administering abortions.

Despite pope's hospitalization, Vatican offices continue to run

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — When Pope John Paul II goes to the hospital, who's in charge at the Vatican?

For Catholics and non-Catholics around the world, the question arose when the 84-year-old pontiff was hospitalized for flu complications in February. At the Vatican, however, it was almost a nonissue.

"It's not really on our minds, because most Vatican business doesn't need the pope's direct intervention," said one member of a Vatican congregation.

"And as long as the pope's absence is brief or his condition allows him to review church

Nun who works in prison ministry a guest at State of the Union

ARLINGTON, Va. (CNS) — Sister Constanca Parcasio, a Missionary Sister of Our Lady of La Salette, was one of about two dozen people chosen by the White House to sit with first lady Laura Bush for President George W. Bush's State of the Union address Feb. 2.

Sister Parcasio is the director of prison ministry for Catholic Charities in the Diocese of Arlington. She was invited to the president's speech before Congress as a representative of a faith-based group and as an acknowledgment of her work with prison inmates.

When Sister Parcasio received a letter from the White House telling her that the president and first lady wanted her to be present at the State of the Union address, she insisted that because she was just a diocesan employee it would be more fitting for the bishop or the director of Catholic Charities to go instead.

But she was told, "Sister Connie, you are the choice of the president. You will represent the faith."

When she heard this, she accepted the invitation.

"Certainly God's ways are totally different from ours" said the Filipino nun. "His flare for choosing the insignificant, the weak and the poor as instruments to put across his message is just beyond my imagination."

"Whatever good will come out from my being elevated to so high a pedestal is for God alone to measure," she said. "But I was happy to be made a symbol and witness for those who believe in the existence of God. I guess my veil has served its purpose once again."

She met the president after the speech and thanked him for his support on issues related to the sanctity of life. She said the president praised Catholic Charities for the help it provides to communities. Laura Bush thanked Sister Parcasio for her work in prison ministry.

The president referred to programs like Sister Parcasio's prison ministry in his speech, noting that the U.S. government would "continue to support faith-based and community groups that bring hope to harsh places."

He also announced an expanded use of DNA evidence to prevent wrongful convictions and said he would be sending a proposal to Congress to fund training for defense counsel in capital cases, adding that "people on trial for their lives must have competent lawyers by their side."

Efforts to reform U.N. in its 60th year draw interest of Vatican

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Efforts to reform the United Nations and its approach to peace and security as it observes its 60th anniversary this year have drawn the interest and support of the Vatican.

Recent attention has been focused on the report of a high-level panel to examine "threats, challenges and change" the international organization is facing in the 21st century.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's U.N. nuncio, told the General Assembly Jan. 31 that the report "in many ways coincides with the Holy See's views."

The nuncio welcomed a broadening of the approach to peace and security that emphasizes preventing conflict and the attention to development goals that would contribute to that objective.

The panel, a 16-member group, called development "the indispensable foundation for a collective security system that takes prevention seriously" because it helps combat the threats to security found in poverty, infectious disease, environmental degradation, civil war, terrorism and organized crime.

Archbishop Migliore said that when the United Nations was founded in 1945, security was mainly viewed as protecting nations against aggression by other nations, but now the concept has to be much broader to include threats not tied to a particular country.

Noting that the Vatican was not pacifist, he said that even though use of force was necessary at times it was "much more necessary to remove the root causes of insecurity and instability in the social, economic and cultural fields."

Vatican official says Ukrainians are example to world

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Ukrainians have stood up for their rights and adhered to their principles despite decades of communism and a recent election scandal, proving themselves to be an example to the world, said a Vatican official.

Ukrainians "have given a splendid example to the world of the defense of a principle — the principle of the need for fair and honest elections in a democratic society," said U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley in a Feb. 7 address to staff and students of the Ukrainian Catholic University in Lviv.

Archbishop Foley, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, praised the country for what has been called "a miracle of peaceful protest and transition to a democratically elected government."

After Ukraine declared former

Prime Minister Victor Yanukovich the winner of a Nov. 21, 2004, presidential election, hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians protested peacefully. Opposition candidate Victor Yushchenko charged fraud and appealed to the Supreme Court, which ordered the Dec. 26 rerun. Yushchenko was declared the new president.

The archbishop also praised Ukrainians who made many sacrifices under Soviet communist rule in order to profess their faith in God and their "desire to remain in union" with the pope.

"The experience of your martyrs under communism and the experience of the recent peaceful transition here in Ukraine" stand out as "some of the most effective communication imaginable — a communication of faith and a communication of freedom," he said.

Vatican official says Sash wearers disqualified from Communion

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican's top liturgy official said Rainbow Sash wearers disqualify themselves from receiving Holy Communion because they are demonstrating their opposition to church teaching on homosexuality.

Cardinal Francis Arinze, head of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments, made the comment in early February.

Rainbow Sash, which describes itself as an organization of gay and lesbian Catholics and their families and friends, has criticized church statements on homosexuality, including the church's teaching that homosexual acts are "intrinsically disordered" and that homosexual orientation is "objectively disordered."

To underline their point, the group's members sometimes attend Mass and receive Communion wearing the sash.

Cardinal Arinze discussed the issue with at least one U.S. archbishop during U.S. bishops' visits to the Vatican in 2004. Asked about his position by CNS, Cardinal Arinze said: "Rainbow Sash wearers are showing their opposition to church teaching on a major issue of natural law and so disqualify themselves from being given holy Communion."

The church teaching that homosexual acts are contrary to natural law and that the homosexual inclination is "objectively disordered" is contained in the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," which was revised and corrected in 1997.

The church also teaches that homosexuals must be accepted with love and respect and that they should not be discriminated against.

Some bishops have denied the Eucharist to Rainbow Sash members on the grounds that they were using the Eucharist to manifest opposition to church teaching. Some Rainbow Sash members have said they consider their wearing of the sash an act of celebration, not protest.

NORTH PALM BEACH, Fla. — Three members of the Diocese of Charlotte recently represented the chapel at Charlotte's airport at a gathering of Catholic airport chaplains.

Deacon Ben Wenning, director of the permanent diaconate; Deacon Jerry Hickey, permanent deacon at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte; and Rick Hanners, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church, attended the National Conference of Catholic Airport Chaplains' annual meeting at Our Lady of Florida Spiritual Center Jan. 25-28. All three men are chaplains at Charlotte Douglas International Airport.

Deacon Wenning was recognized for 14 years of service on the NCCAC administrative board, serving as Secretary for eight of those years. Hanners was elected to the board as a member-at-large.

Other elections included Chicago airport chaplain Father Michael Zaniolo as president and Pittsburgh chaplain Father Jack Fitzgerald as vice-president.

Bishop Gerald M. Barbarito of Palm Beach welcomed the chaplains and celebrated Mass with them on the opening day of the conference, which included presentations of progress reports from the various chaplains across the country.

CHARLOTTE — St. Patrick Cathedral and School and Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte, as well as St. Mark Church in Huntersville are all featured in TIME Magazine.

The article, "Mass Appeal, Bible-Belt Catholics," by Miami Bureau Chief Tim Padgett in the Feb. 14 issue, explains how churches in the Diocese of Charlotte are responding to notable growth by "...being born again in the cradle of born-again Christianity — the South."

Padgett spent three days in the diocese, visiting schools and churches and talking with members of the clergy and the faithful as well as interviewing Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Included in the three-page article are four photographs of worshipers, Catholic school students, clergy and Bishop Jugis.

Father Christopher Roux, master of ceremonies, and Father Paul Gary, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, also were photographed as they celebrated a Catholic Schools Week Mass at St. Patrick with Bishop Jugis.

The bishop described the article as "a tremendous statement in the mainstream media affirming our faith in Jesus Christ and the presence of the Holy Spirit in our diocese."

"Through this exploration of our diocese, I hope that Catholics and all who are seeking Christ will grow in their own faith and love for the Lord," said Bishop Jugis.

A map in the brochure depicts each of the 35 U.S. airports at which a chapel or chaplain is available. Most are in the eastern half of the United States.

"The availability of pastoral services in airports is a rather recent development," the brochure notes, adding that Cardinal Richard Cushing established the first airport chapel at Logan International Airport in Boston in 1950.

"Today over 100 airport chapels in 50 nations offer pastoral care," it adds.

Vatican continues to run, despite pope's illness affairs from his hospital bed, there's simply no problem," the official added.

In fact, Vatican sources said, some important church business was already being sent over for papal review on the second day of the pope's hospitalization at Rome's Gemelli Hospital.

There are some things only the pope can do, like appoint bishops, make curial appointments or approve some major documents. But the bulk of the daily work performed by the more than 30 major offices of the Roman Curia does not need the pope's immediate supervision.

"We see the pope three times a year. So if it's a short-term hospital stay, there's virtually no effect on our work," said one member of the Congregation for Saints' Causes.

The heads of a few other congregations — for doctrine, bishops and evangelization — typically meet with the pope once a week, so the pope's absence would impact them more. But, in general, the curial machinery grinds on.

"We're handling 100 letters a day out of the Secretariat of State. You'd think there might be a slowdown, but there's not," said one Vatican official.

Inside the Apostolic Palace, the five-story building that houses the papal residence and top Vatican offices, it was business as usual during the pope's fourth day in the hospital.

A few steps down the marble corridor from the pope's apartment, prelates carrying sheaves of papers hurried toward the offices of the Secretariat of State's second section, which deals with international affairs. At the elevator, a diplomat arrived for an appointment.

"The work is continuing at its usual pace. In the past, if there's something that urgently requires the pope's attention, Cardinal (Angelo) Sodano takes it to the Gemelli. In this situation, I don't know if the pope's condition allows that yet," said one official.

Cardinal Sodano, the Vatican's secretary of state, is the one expected to "take care of everything" until the pope returns, the official said. That presumes the pontiff is absent for a short time and is not incapacitated for a longer period.

As church law experts have pointed out, the church has no clear mechanism to deal with the situation of a pope who goes into a long coma, for example, or is otherwise "impeded," to use the church's term. It is possible the pope has prepared instructions for such an eventuality, but if so they have not been published.

The prospect of a lengthy absence seemed far from the minds of Vatican officials, even as the pope's hospital stay lengthened. While outsiders might have expected an atmosphere of crisis inside the Vatican walls, that was not in evidence.

"It seems like he's over the worst part and is improving. There's no big worry here. People are relaxed," said one highly placed monsignor.

"He'll be back in a few days and will be around for a few more years," a Swiss Guard predicted confidently.

At the Vatican typographical offices, a nun said she was convinced the pope was helped by the prayers of the world.

"It's true he is an elderly man and with all the health problems he's had the flu is not a minor thing," she said. She added something that's become a signature comment about this pope: "But he's got a very strong character."

Inside the Vatican gates, life went on: Employees lined up at the Vatican bank, pilgrims came to order papal blessings, priests and bishops arrived for meetings, and the Pontifical Academy of Sciences hosted a conference.

At the Vatican newspaper's photo office, where pilgrims order photos of papal audiences and liturgical events, there was a marked reduction in traffic. With audiences canceled indefinitely, the place was almost empty. No photos of the pope had been made available since Jan. 30, when he made his last public appearance at his apartment window for a noon blessing.

Vatican official's comment reignites debate over papal resignation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When a top Vatican official said papal resignation should be left to the "conscience" of Pope John Paul II, it reignited a debate that has been smoldering for years.

Inside and outside the Vatican, prelates and lay experts have fallen into two camps: those who think the pope would resign if he felt he could not lead the church, and those who say it will never happen — that the pontiff has clearly decided to stay at the church's helm until God takes him.

With a weakened pope in the hospital for flu-related breathing problems, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican secretary of state, was asked Feb. 7 by reporters if he thought the pope would consider resigning. He gave an answer that appeared to recognize resignation as an eventual possibility: "We have to have enormous trust in him. He knows what he should do."

For the media and papal commentators, that was enough to start the wheels turning.

No one questions whether a pope can resign: It's happened before, the last time in 1294 when Pope Celestine V abdicated. The papal resignation option is explicitly written into the Code of Canon Law. It says a pope may step down, but stipulates that the decision must be made freely and "duly manifested."

Those are two crucial conditions and would be problematic if a pope becomes so sick that he cannot express his wishes unequivocally.

Some have suggested that Pope John Paul, who suffers from a debilitating neurological disease, may have already prepared a letter of resignation in case that happens. Pope Pius VI prepared a similar letter in his old age. But church law experts say even that kind of letter might leave some doubt, because it would be papal aides who ultimately determine when it should be implemented.

A number of cardinals have said they believed the pope would resign for the good of the church if he were unable to physically bear the burden of the papacy.

But no one has said in public that the time for resignation has come. On the contrary, Vatican officials and others have marveled at the ability of the pope to somehow carry on, year after year, even as he has lost the ability to walk, to speak clearly and to endure long audiences.

Indeed, the pope's perseverance has convinced some that he will stay in the papacy to the end.

Those close to the pope have insisted that the pope's management abilities may be of secondary importance compared to the spiritual witness he is giving.

Many Vatican officials say the pope — never much of a hands-on manager — in his present frail condition has delegated even more responsibility to selected aides.

The pope's public presence has been reduced, too. Even before his hospitalization, many of the pope's public events featured stand-ins who read the pope's talk or celebrated the liturgies for him.

For the Catholic faithful, resignation is also a sensitive issue. When asked, many of those who see the pope in action express mixed sentiments: admiration for his courage and deep concern about his ability to keep going.

would be part of my job," she said. "No one prepared you or talked about it."

One night when she came in to work, she was told by an intern that there was a patient who was terminating her pregnancy. Kennedy was responsible for inserting laminaria suppositories into the cervix, which dilates the cervix prior to delivery or a surgical abortion.

Kennedy referred to administering abortions as "scut work that was pawned off on interns" while more senior residents worked in labor and delivery.

Kennedy said she didn't know she had the option of refusing to participate in abortion procedures. None of the other doctors in the hospital, some of whom were Catholic also, talked about the ethics of abortion.

"It can be difficult to risk being criticized by others, especially in a professional setting," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life Office. "However, we are called to spread the message of Psalm 139: 'Truly you have formed my inmost being; you knit me in my mother's womb.'"

Like many women who have had abortions, doctors are also shamed into silence about their roles in abortion, according to Kennedy.

"I justified it by saying, 'She is someone else's patient' and told myself I was just doing my job," said Kennedy, who was raised in a pro-life Catholic family. "In my heart of hearts I felt bad about it."

Kennedy felt she had no pro-life role models in the hospital. After a while, she refused to take part in administering abortions, causing tension with her fellow residents, who had already "done their stints" and now had to perform abortions again.

A few years later, as an OB/GYN in private practice, she saw firsthand the physical and emotional aftereffects abortion had on her patients.

Kennedy recalled one of her former patients, a woman who had had several abortions prior to becoming her patient. While under her care, the patient had pre-cancerous cells removed.

"She was a young person who had gotten into a bad situation," Kennedy said. Because of her abortions and various medical procedures, "carrying a baby to term was going to be very high risk, very difficult for her."

Kennedy became frustrated, feeling like the woman was "using up her options" each time she had an abortion.

Another patient, pregnant with her first child, came to see Kennedy and was worried about her pregnancy.

"She was worried above and beyond the normal 'first-time jitters,'" said Kennedy, who later learned she had aborted a pregnancy prior to her marriage. "She was worried that because she had had an abortion, something bad was going to happen ... not that God would get her back, but from a purely medical standpoint."

According to Kennedy, women don't come to their OB/GYN and "spill their guts."

"Abortion isn't one of those things that people are proud of or (admit) matter of factly," said Kennedy. "It was always one of those things that was a secret."

Most patients would not admit to an abortion unless they were asked directly by their doctors.

"A number of them had never shared it with their husbands," she said. "There is a lot of secrecy about (abortion). There aren't a lot of people who say 'it was the best thing I ever did.'"

What Kennedy heard more often were stories of shame, regret and guilt.

"The people I saw who came back (after having had an abortion) were always regretful and distraught," Kennedy said.

Having a family of her own prompted Kennedy to "get right" and return to her Catholic roots. She retired from private practice to raise her three children, now ages 16 months to 6 years old.

A member of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, Kennedy is now active with her parish Respect Life Committee and promotes Natural Family Planning.

NFP, the only method of birth control accepted by the Catholic Church, is based on the observance of physical signs of a woman's fertility.

"I commend Dr. Kennedy for coming forward with her story," said Nadol. "Her willingness to share her personal journey can serve as an example to witness to the sanctity of life."

"I owe it to women in honor of all the women I've taken care of and the ones that I didn't help to be 'silent no more,'" said Kennedy. "I feel like I'm doing the right thing now. I thank God I had that re-awakening."

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 7

Last week we began our discussion of the Introductory Rites of the Mass. We already discussed the entrance procession, incensation of the altar, the Sign of the Cross and the celebrant's greeting. We continue our discussion of the Introductory Rites this week by examining the "Penitential Rite."

As we mentioned earlier, from beginning to end the Mass is a prayer; in fact, the highest act of prayer known to mankind, since the Mass is the worship of the Son of God unto the Father. As members of Christ's mystical body, the Church, we participate in his perfect worship. The Mass teaches us how to pray. And the first lesson of prayer, the primary movement of the Mass, is humility.

In imitation of Christ — who humbled himself to become man; who humbled himself to take upon himself our sins; who humbled himself to undergo his passion, crucifixion and death on our behalf — we must humble ourselves. And so the Church seeks to imitate the humility of Christ by first recognizing our sins and acknowledging the fact that we are sinners in desperate need of God's mercy. We must first recognize that we are empty before we can be filled. Therefore, the celebrant invites us to pause, examine our consciences in silence and ask for God's mercy and forgiveness.

During this brief moment of silence at the beginning of the Mass, we might be wondering what to think about: what I did last night; or the movie I saw last week; or what to eat for breakfast after Mass. However, we should examine our consciences, recalling particular sins, but also our overall need for forgiveness and mercy for the sins we have committed and the good we have omitted, which we may have forgotten.

It is a moment to prepare our souls to abandon our old sinful habits and seek the grace and mercy that God has prepared for us in receiving his body and blood in holy Communion. If we become conscious of serious mortal sins, we should resolve to go to the sacrament of reconciliation as soon as possible and refrain from receiving holy Communion.

Although the Penitential Rite does not grant absolution for mortal sins, it does help us to receive forgiveness for our less serious, venial sins, which are forgiven when we receive holy Communion with humility and love.

After a few moments of silence, the celebrant begins a prayer, known by its first word in Latin, the Confiteor: "I confess to Almighty God" As a community, we confess that we are guilty of sins in thought, word and deed. Then, we seek the intercession of "Blessed Mary, ever Virgin," who was conceived without sin and remained sinless throughout her life; the angels, who battle with Satan and defeat evil; the saints, who were sinners like us, but cooperated with God's grace and mercy to defeat their own sinfulness; and finally, the members of the Church Militant, "and you, my brothers and sisters, to pray to the Lord our God for me."

The celebrant completes this prayer with a prayer that begs for God's mercy, seeks forgiveness and leads us to heaven.

Finally, the Penitential Rite closes with the ancient threefold litany: Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison, Kyrie eleison ["Lord have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy"]. This litany of mercy is the only surviving vestige of the Greek language remaining in the Latin Rite of the Catholic Church. Whether the Mass is offered in Latin, English, Spanish or Swahili, this Greek prayer may be recited or chanted by the celebrant, deacon or cantor.

This formula, "Lord, have mercy," really comes straight from the Gospel. Oftentimes a great healing by Christ is preceded by the humble cry of a beggar: "Son of David, have mercy on me!" That is precisely where we find ourselves at the beginning of Mass: poor beggars in need of God's mercy. And that is why we approach the throne of our Heavenly Father in humility from the very beginning.

Now that we have acknowledged our sinfulness before God and our neighbors, we can sing the biblical hymn of praise, known by its first word in Latin, The Gloria, which we will examine next week.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincoln.

Schools focus on 'Faith in Every Student'

The purpose of the week was to build support and recognition for the more than 8,000 Catholic elementary and secondary schools nationwide, including the 18 schools in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Beginning on Sunday, Jan. 30, through the entire week of travels to our schools, it was amazing to see the variety of activities taking place," said Linda Cherry, superintendent. "No matter where I was or what was going on, the spirit of our Catholic Schools was present."

Dominican Sister Glenn Anne McPhee, secretary for education at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said that the theme of "Faith in Every Student" underscores two guiding principles of Catholic education — the fact that faith is an important value at the foundation of a Catholic school curriculum and that Catholic schools have faith that every student can achieve.

"Catholic school leaders are committed to making a difference," said Sister McPhee. "Our goal is to graduate students who have strong moral standards and fine academic skills who will become good citizens and able members of the workforce."

"I loved the theme of this year's Catholic Schools Week. I think that says it all," said Sandra McMonagle, principal of Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem. "It (the theme) is something we really practice — we do have faith in every student."

McMonagle said Catholic students are expected to behave as Christians and follow Gospel values.

"We have high expectations for them," she said, "and we want them to succeed as best they can with their God-given abilities. They can do whatever God has given them the ability to do."

The ability to openly celebrate the Catholic faith is one unique aspect of Catholic schools. During the week, many schools held special Masses. On Feb. 3, the feast of St. Blaise, Father Thomas Kessler, pastor of St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem, and Father Johnathan Hanic, parochial vicar, visited the school to bless the throats of students.

At Immaculata School in Hendersonville, students placed carnations in vases in their classrooms to serve as a "symbolic remembrance" of the Indian Ocean tsunami victims. The students prayed for the victims daily, said Principal Bill Meehan.

Throughout the week, the schools celebrated the parish family, the community, the volunteers and the students, and many dioceses encouraged parents to enroll their children in Catholic schools by offering open houses.

"The week calls attention to the uniqueness of our schools, and demonstrates the impact we make in our communities," said Meehan. "It gives us the opportunity to reach out and publicize."

"Service to the community is an important aspect to our Catholic schools," said Faye Almon, president of St. Patrick School's Parent Teacher Organization in Charlotte.

St. Patrick students organized a canned food drive for Catholic Social Services and collected books for a local public elementary school with a high number of low-income families. St. Patrick fifth-graders delivered the books and read to the school's younger students.

At Our Lady of Mercy School, students helped deliver food for Meals on Wheels and the Salvation Army, as well as baked and delivered cookies to a local nursing home. At Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, students delivered baked goods to local fire fighters, police and emergency services personnel and took Valentine's Day presents to residents at Maryfield Nursing Home.

The first annual Catholic Schools Week was in 1974, and became part of The National Marketing Campaign for Catholic Schools in 1991, a joint effort by the National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA) and the USCCB.

"Catholic education is one of the great and generous works of the church," said Michael J. Guerra, NCEA president. "Our graduates have become leaders of this country, teachers, religious men and women and business entrepreneurs. Without a doubt, our schools have had a far-reaching impact on shaping the world."

"We truly appreciate our students and our responsibility as leaders, to ensure that the faith within them stays alive and grows while they are in our Catholic schools," said Cherry.

National Appreciation Day was established to showcase the great accomplishments and contributions of Catholic schools to the country. A delegation of more than 150 Catholic school students, teachers and parents visited Capitol Hill in Washington to meet with congressional leaders to promote Catholic schools Feb. 2.

The delegation hand-delivered letters from chief administrators of Catholic education to their representatives and provided a background package on Catholic schools to every congressional office.

"Catholic Schools weeks is a way to remind us of the value of a Catholic education and the impact that it can have on a child's life," said Paola Scilinguo, director of advancement at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville.

"If we continue to have faith in every student, then we can be sure that each and every one of them will reach their full potential, and we will be changing the world one student at a time," said Scilinguo.

Faith and fun at St. Leo School

Outreach project, special visitors highlight CSW

BY SUSAN DEGUZMAN
CORRESPONDENT

WINSTON-SALEM — A living rosary, a blessing of the throats, special Masses, visits from a congresswoman and an appearance on the local news made for a fun and meaningful Catholic Schools Week at St. Leo the Great School.

While the theme of this year's Catholic Schools Week, "Faith in Every Student," was celebrated with a different emphasis each day, an ongoing outreach project that truly defined the week's theme.

The "Blanket Our Community" project started during the week and continues through Valentine's Day, Feb. 14. Donated by school families, a collection of blankets — many already lining the halls of the school — will be donated to local homeless people.

"The students understand that faith is expressed through service to others," said Principal Georgette Schraeder.

"We have used the 'Faith in Every Student' theme throughout the year with collections for the military in Iraq, tsunami victims, those suffering from natural disasters, as well as with our regular Christmas, Easter and Caring Friends outreach efforts," she said.

Visits from Congresswoman Virginia Foxx (R-NC 5th) and Judith Marsh, a Department of Veterans Affairs Representative, highlighted "With Our Community" Day Jan. 31.

When asked by a student about her favorite subject in school, Foxx replied that it was reading and English.

"You can do anything you want if you can read," she said.

Presented with a book of prayers from the students, Foxx said she would ask the congressional chaplain if he would read one of the prayers at the opening of the congressional session, thereby securing its place in the permanent record.

A gift of "Valentines for Vets" drew the attention of the local media which featured the school in a segment on the evening news. Marsh, who had previously visited the school on Veterans Day in November 2004, returned to accept the Valentine gifts made by students for patients in nearby veterans' hospitals.

Marsh also accepted a large hand-printed flag made by the eighth-grade class after the Sept. 11, 2001 tragedies.

"With Our Community" Day also included a student presentation about the life of St. John Bosco and a clown show by Timothy Kiefer, a N.C. School of the Arts student. John Egan, a youth minister at St. Leo the Great Church, explained that St. John Bosco, the patron of clowns, actors and performers, was devoted to the welfare of youths. The saint would captivate his young audiences with his clown performances and include Gospel teachings as part of his act.

Dino Gaudio, assistant coach of men's basketball at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, visited the school for "With Our Students" Day Feb. 1.

Gaudio spoke to students about how to achieve success in their lives. His three key ingredients were to care about other people, have pride in what you do and deal with difficulties and adversities in life — don't try to avoid them, he said, but expect them.

He also told students that their names are the most important things that they own, that all relationships are based on trust and that their role models are not Britney Spears or Michael Jordan, "but the people who sit with you at the dinner table each night."

The remainder of Catholic Schools Week included a living rosary on "With Our Nation" Day Feb. 2; a blessing of the students' throats on the feast of St. Blaise, and a lunch and dinner gatherings for "With Our Families" Day Feb. 3; and a Mass and visit from Superintendent Linda Cherry in celebration of "With Our Clergy, Faculty and Staff" Day Feb. 4.

ASHEVILLE — A variety of speakers and performers entertained students at Asheville Catholic School for Catholic Schools Week.

James Mullen Jr., chancellor of the University of North Carolina at Asheville, was one of the speakers at the all-school assembly Jan. 31. Mullen, a Catholic, encouraged the students to "take lessons learned in Catholic school and take them into the community."

Other speakers included Robert Gabordi, editor of the Asheville Citizen-Times and representatives of Our Place, a home for abused children that is assisted by student volunteers from Asheville Catholic School.

Poet Glenis Redmon entertained the students Feb. 1 and discussed how she crafts her poetry. Billy Jonas, a musician who visited the school in December, returned Feb. 4 with his unique style of music and comedy.

Working with fourth- and fifth-graders, Jonas guided the students in crafting and playing percussion instruments made from large garbage cans, industrial-sized plastic containers and other objects.

Other Catholic Schools Week activities included student skits about their parishes and teachers, and a musical performance.

Two books — one negative, one positive — explore pope's life

REVIEWED BY GRAHAM G. YEARLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Reading "The Pontiff in Winter: Triumph and Conflict in the Reign of John Paul II" by John Cornwell (the author of the best seller, "Hitler's Pope") is like watching someone knock down an old man and give him a few kicks for good measure. The observer is horrified but fascinated. "The Pontiff in Winter" is mean-spirited, sloppily edited and repetitive.

The book begins with a quick biographical sketch of the pope's childhood and adulthood leading up to his elevation to the papacy. Then in loose chronological order, Cornwell lays out the various social questions and political the fact that no pope in modern history has resigned and that the idea of retirement to this pope is abhorrent, no matter how ill he becomes.

The editing of "The Pontiff in Winter" is so sloppy that it makes plain the haste in which the book was rushed to publication. For example, Cornwell's reaction to the revelation of the "third secret of Fatima" is brought up once and then, strangely, restated a hundred pages later in almost the same wording. The short chapters dealing with various problems read like short articles written for other publications and hastily shoved into book form.

After "Hitler's Pope" — Cornwell's book on Pope Pius XII and the Nazis — it seems a wonder anyone at the Vatican would let Cornwell sit at a major ceremony no more than 10 feet from the pope, musing on how ill and feeble he looks, knowing those musings would show up in print.

The Holy Father's own book, "Rise, Let Us Be on Our Way," is his second volume of autobiography and meditation, covering the years from 1958, when he was made a bishop, to his elevation to the papacy in 1978.

The first book, "Gift and Mystery," contained perhaps more dramatic portions of his life — his brief acting career, the Nazi occupation of Poland, and his secret seminary training during the war years. But this volume charts his development as a bishop and archbishop, periods that are more crucial to understanding his papacy.

Pope John Paul comes off as a Polish Will Rogers; he never seems to have met a priest or religious or lay person he didn't like. Only the communist governments of the Eastern bloc get the cold shoulder and, then, no individuals are named. When the names of Polish bishops, nuns and priests, unknown to most, become stultifying, the meditations on the episcopacy, St. Joseph and modern saints reawaken readers to the fact that Pope John Paul is a man of profound faith and a writer of memorable prose.

Yearley studies theology at the Ecumenical Institute of St. Mary's Seminary and University in Baltimore.

situations Pope John Paul II has dealt with (or refused to deal with): communism, religious oppression, pluralism, materialism, women as priests, sexuality, ecumenism, to name a few.

In every case, Cornwell finds Pope John Paul's response either wrong-headed or callously dismissive. However, the relentless negativity numbs the reader to the moments where Cornwell's outrage is appropriately incisive.

For example, on the pope's opposition to the use of condoms, even in the face of the rapid spread of AIDS in Africa, Cornwell's comments have a Swifteen anger and power. In other places, Cornwell seems to fault the pope for not adopting his agenda — that of a liberal Western Catholic — when Pope John Paul has made it clear that the liberal Western agenda is not his.

Cornwell seems particularly irked that the pope has not resigned as his health declines. He seems oblivious to

God has a plan for everyone

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

About 18 months ago, my husband and I were immersed in the emotionally and physically draining activities of burying my mother-in-law and taking our oldest daughter out of state to begin college. For us "40-somethings," returning home after those few whirlwind days and settling back into a routine was a welcome respite.

Then came the morning when I casually remarked for the umpteenth time, "I really wish I were beginning my doctorate" — and my husband replied, "Then why don't you?"

Five months later I was applying to university programs, and six months after that we were packing up the family and all our belongings to move to Ohio after more than 40 years of living in Texas. (If that wasn't crazy enough, imagine going back to college after 20 years away from it!)

The amazing circumstances and events that accompanied our move are too numerous to mention, but they confirmed in many ways that God indeed was directing our steps, no matter how fearful I felt or how outlandish I thought our decision was at times. Indeed, I could completely identify with today's Genesis story!

In both the Abram narrative and Matthew's account of the Transfiguration, God clearly is telling or showing people a vision by which they are to come to a deeper understanding of their role in the divine scheme of things. As bizarre as these revelations must have seemed, God, knowing human frailty, accompanied them either with providential signs or the words, "Don't be afraid."

Abram was encouraged to experience God's presence in the moment. Only then, reassured, was he able to leave Haran for a land he did not know, just as Jesus' transfigured presence empowered the disciples to descend the mountain with him toward a series of events they could not have anticipated.

Sure, there are still times I find myself wondering: "Why me? Why now?" I certainly haven't been shown the entire vision for my future, how the completed doctoral degree will fit into the picture or the specific ways I will be called to serve God and others.

Nevertheless, strengthened by God's provision and peace, I am certain that, for the present, I am where I need to be. For it is in the present that God's sustaining "presence" is found.

Professor examines Hollywood's depiction of Muslims and Arabs

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Hollywood depiction of Muslims and Arabs has taken a decidedly more ambivalent tone in the past half-century, according to Lourdes Alvarez, an assistant professor of modern languages at The Catholic University of America.

"Political events and shifts in American perceptions of the Middle East" have played a large role in the shift from what had been a more benign and respectful treatment of Islam, Alvarez said in a Feb. 1 presentation at Catholic University.

Now, she said, there are "ubiquitous Hollywood representations of the Middle East as a place of religious extremism, violence and terrorism."

In an earlier era, when "the United States was not yet dependent on foreign oil and thus not yet vulnerable to fluctuations in price or supply, the creation of the state of Israel in 1948, and the subsequent war with its Arab neighbors, made fantasy films about the Orient a much less marketable prospect at the box office," Alvarez said in her presentation, "Thieves of Baghdad: Hollywood Revisits the Arabian Nights."

"As the Middle East loomed ever larger in strategic importance to the United States, as Middle Eastern interests were increasingly perceived to be in conflict with those of the United States, Hollywood portrayals became more negative," Alvarez said.

Alvarez said there are three distinct types of Hollywood films with Arabs and Islam at their center:

— Stories based on "The Arabian Nights," also known as the "1,001 Nights."

— "Sheik" films ranging from the Rudolph Valentino silent-era classics to "Lawrence of Arabia," whose protagonists are "Westerners who have adopted Arab ways and are now on some level more Arab than the Arabs," said Alvarez.

— Arabian action films along the lines of "Raiders of the Lost Ark," in which, Alvarez said, "there aren't really any Arabs."

The tales have also spawned a variety of cartoon representations, including the 1992 Disney animated film "Aladdin," whose $200 million box-office take was the highest up to that time for an animated picture.

Alvarez noted that 18th-century Frenchman Antoine Galland looked for additional tales to flesh out "The Arabian Nights." As a result, two of the most famous stories — "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" and "Aladdin and the Magic Lamp" — are of dubious scholarship as they are not found in any of the early manuscripts.

"Arabian Nights" films "present a more varied array of characters" than their sheik or action counterparts, Alvarez said. "There are good and bad Arabs here." The movies also tend to portray both positives and negatives about Arab culture, she said.

On the positive side is "the idea of the East as a repository of ancient knowledge or wisdom, of values that have been lost in the West," Alvarez added, while on the negative side, "the East is portrayed as a place of ignorance, credulity, corruption, savagery and decadence."

Comparing the evolution of the Hollywood Western with the Hollywood "Eastern" — Alvarez's term for Arabian-themed movies — Arab characters have moved from a more benign persona to an evil persona, while American Indian characters have done the opposite.

"As time passed and memories of the brutal clashes of the 19th century faded, Indians were no longer perceived as threatening to U.S. interests. Westerns begin depicting Indians as more noble, as the possessors of ancient spiritual truths that have been forgotten by modern civilization," she added.

"You even get a film like 'Dances With Wolves,' which features Kevin Costner adopting Indian ways, not altogether unlike those early Valentino films in which Westerners adopt the rugged lifestyle of the desert," she noted.

Pro golfer attributes healing to Lourdes water

Free books offered to asthma, allergy sufferers

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

HENDERSONVILLE — People might say Ron Garcia has many blessings for which to be thankful.

Between 1970 and 1982, the professional golfer won 16 Florida Winter Tournaments and other mini tours; set five course records, at least three of which are still intact; made the longest hole-in-one in 1974; and shot a double eagle using a driver and an eight-iron on a 511-yard par 5.

Despite his achievements on the green, Garcia said it is a spiritual experience that is his greatest success story. And he wants to share it with others.

"It's a powerful avenue to pray to the Blessed Mother for intercessions," said Garcia. "I think my faith in that is why I received this blessing."

Garcia, a life member of the Professional Golfer's Association, had suffered from debilitating asthma and year-round allergies since his youth. For years, he had to use medicines that made him "lethargic and irritable," and were possibly generating glaucoma in his eyes.

In what he described as "spur of the moment" in 1995, Garcia tried something different, something divine, to cure him of his ailments.

And it worked.

"My allergist said she had no explanation for it," said Garcia. "Well, I do."

Garcia had acquired a small bottle of water from Lourdes, France. The pamphlet cautioned that while some people who used the water were cured of their ailments, many others were not.

Ron Garcia holds the bottle of Lourdes water from which he believes God healed him of asthma and almost all of his former allergies.

But after putting the water on his nose and cheeks, he received a "tremendous blessing." The asthma and allergies immediately went away, he said.

"It is really important to me that it's understood I never had asthma again," said Garcia.

However, approximately four months later, the allergies came back.

"I was shocked, confused," he said.

Garcia was forced back on the allergy medicine. But in May 1996, he used a second application of the Lourdes' water.

Since then, he takes the allergy medicines only two months of the year. Doctors who examined Garcia's lungs a few years ago told him he has the lung capacity of a 25 year old.

"I'm healthier now than when I was 16 years old," he said.

A cradle Catholic born and raised near Pittsburgh, Garcia grew up dedicated to his faith, attributing this to his parents and education by the Sisters of Saint Joseph.

He was fascinated with the appearances of Mary at Fatima, Guadalupe and especially Lourdes.

The miracle of Lourdes began in 1858, when Mary appeared 18 times to Bernadette Soubirous in a grotto near Lourdes. Mary told the girl to dig in the grotto and a spring appeared. Many people have had illnesses cured by the spring's waters, including the 66 cures deemed miraculous by a church-appointed medical board, according to Catholic News Service.

While drawn to Lourdes, Garcia saw no way to travel to southern France. Then a flyer advertising Lourdes water came in the mail from the Franciscan Mission Associates in Mt. Vernon, N.Y.

"I sent for it immediately," he said, but did not apply it right away. "I sort of saw it for life-threatening experiences."

It was six months before he made the first application in 1995. Now, as a result of his healing, Garcia, who currently works as a professional trader of stocks and bonds, describes himself as "more Catholic than ever."

"The appearances of Mary are a cornerstone of my faith," he said. "God obviously wants us to pray to Blessed Mary to intercede for us with Christ."

Compelled to share his experience of being healed by God and his own family's "five decades of interaction with the Blessed Mother," Garcia wrote a book titled "Another Blessing from Lourdes." To celebrate both the feast of Our Lady of Lourdes Feb. 11 and the 10 years since his religious experience, Garcia is giving away 10 free copies of his book.

"I would prefer to give them away to people with asthma and allergies ... because there is a lot of valuable information for them," he said. "But, the book offers more than that."

There are four personal stories in the book — Garcia's religious experience with the Lourdes water, his mother's experience with the Blessed Mother, his sister's death and his hole-in-one story.

Garcia said his book shows that the power of Mary and Lourdes, and the Catholic faith, are alive and well.

"We've had some terrible things happen in the Catholic Church, but I'm proud of my church," he said. "My book shows that the Catholic faith is as strong as it ever was."

Experts discuss brain death

activity might not indicate the actual death of the person.

"Brain death is not death," said U.S. Dr. Paul Byrne, former president of the Catholic Medical Association.

In a brain-dead patient, "the heart beats, the body is warm, vital organs like the liver and kidney are functioning and there is respiration, albeit supported" by a mechanical ventilator, he said during a Feb. 3-4 meeting sponsored by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences.

Pope John Paul II called for the special meeting "in order to re-study the signs of death and verify at a purely scientific level the validity of the criterion of brain death," said the chancellor of the academy, Bishop Marcelo Sanchez Sorondo.

In 1985 and again in 1989, the Pontifical Academy of Sciences upheld brain death as "the true criterion for death, given that the complete cessation of cardiorespiratory functions leads very quickly to brain death," the bishop said in introductory remarks to the meeting.

Bishop Sanchez said the academy "invited those who are critical" of the Vatican's current position on brain death and organ donation in order to hear their arguments and determine whether there is enough new material to warrant another more formal gathering.

A just balance

The Vatican wants to maintain a "virtuous and just" balance between the two immoral extremes of hastening someone's death and refusing to allow someone to die, he said.

The bishop said people should not impose "death (euthanasia) even with the aim of saving another's life through transplantation," nor should they over-use life-support machines, which the pope has defined as "persistent or aggressive medical treatment."

In an Aug. 28, 2000, speech to an international congress on transplantation, the pope, too, cautiously endorsed total brain death as an indicator of a potential organ donor's death.

In that speech, he agreed with the consensus of the scientific community that "the complete and irreversible cessation of all brain activity (in the cerebrum, cerebellum and brain stem) if rigorously applied, does not seem to conflict with the essential elements of anthropology."

But some doctors and philosophers debate whether a brain-dead patient is truly dead. The definition is important, they say, because if the person is in some way alive or his condition is reversible, then the removal of vital organs for transplant is tantamount to homicide.

"Organs are taken while a person is still alive," Stuart Youngner, head of the Department of Bioethics at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, said.

Otherwise organs such as the heart, lungs and liver would no longer be viable for transplantation, he said, because when an individual's heart and breathing have stopped organs and tissues begin to degenerate.

Some organs "like the heart, lungs and liver deteriorate so quickly they must be obtained from living bodies," said Dr. David Hill, a British anesthetist.

But whether a living body without a functioning brain is equivalent to a living person was the crux of the meeting's debates.

Human rights

"Human zygotes, human blastocysts and human embryos do not have a brain or brain function," but the church considers these very early stages of a human embryo to still be a human with the right to life, said Bishop Fabian W. Bruskewitz of Lincoln, Neb.

The bishop even called into question the morality of organ donation.

"In vitro fertilizations, gamete transfer techniques and similar undertakings have been clearly taught as immoral, married couples having been told very clearly that there is no intrinsic right to have children," he wrote.

"Similarly, it may be necessary to determine from a moral as well as canonical point of view whether there is a right to have donated organs from other human beings inserted into one's body," he said.

French Dr. Didier Houssin said that the phenomenon of brain death has "resulted from the progress of emergency medical care."

Massive head trauma or a brain hemorrhage and resulting brain damage today no longer always result in immediate death because "modern medical techniques" of ambulatory and intensive care provide for rapid reanimation, he said in his presentation.

The body of a brain-dead patient appears alive because of sophisticated life support measures, such as artificial ventilation, he said.

But brain death brought with it the possibility for new life through organ donation, he said.

Taking the living organs from a brain-dead patient is "an act of generosity and gives sense to the brutal and unacceptable end of the deceased for its grieving family," he wrote.

Using organs after brain death is an example of solidarity that entails the "acceptance of death after intense lifesaving efforts" and the will "to fight for the life of patients waiting for an organ transplant," he said.

Catholic Schools Week: 'Faith in Every Student'

Theme captures truth that God gifts children

I recall the scene so vividly. I was preparing to celebrate Mass with the fifth-graders at Sacred Heart School in Quincy, Mass. In my approach to the altar, I was impressed deeply by the multicolored banner that the youngsters had fashioned for the faith-filled festivities. Its message was both simple and sublime. Beneath the image of a resplendent rainbow were etched the words, "I believe in God because of rainbows."

So often I have reflected upon that childlike profession of faith. As my life has unfolded, I have been impressed more and more by the wisdom contained in that statement of belief. All of us can acknowledge unhesitatingly that we believe in God because of rainbows. After all, from a visual perspective, the rainbow consists of a series of colors standing together there complementarily.

Who can deny that our faith is a dynamic, evolving reality? What one of us would not agree that word, worship and witness blend together so that our faith might become living, conscious and active? Isn't it true that parents, teachers and other caring people have enabled us, by their selfless generosity, to discover the passionate presence of God in our lives?

Each of these experiences and relationships blends together, like the colors of a rainbow, to point beyond themselves to the divine. So often the extraordinary is made apparent in the ordinary, the truly significant is contained within the seemingly insignificant.

Day after day as children and youth participate in the graced environment of the Catholic school, they are enabled to recognize and appreciate the gift of faith and challenged to perform acts of faith. In short, from that two-fold perspective, the theme of this year's Catholic Schools Week, "Faith in Every Student," captures succinctly the comforting and challenging truth that the children and youth are both gifted by God and called to be gifts to others.

Long before the blessed event at Sacred Heart School, I was the beneficiary of a memorable message from my mother. Shortly after my graduation from Cathedral High School in Boston, she shared an insight that I continue to treasure. She said,

Guest Column

FATHER JAMES HAWKER
GUEST COLUMNIST

"Jimmy, remember your roots, remember that you are related, dependent and responsible."

Every Catholic School, if it is to be true to its identity and mission, must echo in action that sentiment shared with me 50 years ago. How, then, might that school be described?

It is a grace-filled environment within which its participants are assisted to cultivate their identity as God's children.

It is a setting within which they are guided to remember their roots, as they come to a deeper appreciation of the truth that their lives are rooted in the love of Jesus Christ.

It is a unique context within which they are enabled to appreciate that they are related to God and neighbor.

They are dependent upon the love of their Father in Heaven and responsible for being attentive and responsive to the needs of their neighbors.

The Diocese of Charlotte is blessed beyond measure by the devotion and dedication of so many administrators and teachers who, together with parents, are attentive to Faith in Every Student.

Father Hawker is vicar of education in the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

What made the fallen angels' choice 'irrevocable'?

Q. My question arises not only from my own curiosity, but from my children. I realize no one can say whether or not anyone is in hell, since we have no window into God's mercy. But I don't understand this "irrevocable choice" of the angels, which the Catechism of the Catholic Church speaks of (No. 393).

What made it irrevocable? Why was there no turning back? (Illinois)

A. It is Catholic teaching, going back centuries, that some angels sinned against their Creator in such a grave way that they lost their presence with God forever. This belief is rooted most of all in numerous Scriptural passages, both Old and New Testament, such as Satan falling from heaven (Luke 10:18), being driven from heaven (Rev 12), and "the devil and his angels" occupying a place apart from God, where those who reject our Lord's command of love and service to neighbor are destined to go (Matt 25:41).

Apart from this, and that we humans enjoy the guardianship of some angels, we know little or nothing about details of the angels' nature and fate. Our information comes almost entirely from philosophical reasoning about what pure spirits must be like, and from the — often obscure — references in the Scriptures.

Endless theological guesses have tried to identify what their sin may have been, but there is general agreement that somehow it involved a grievous offense of pride against God. If angels, as Christians believe, have no body or bodily functions and passions like ours, they are simply incapable of many of the immoral actions we humans are prone to.

This begins to address your question about how angelic sin could be irrevocable. One of the consequences of the angels being pure spirits would be that their intelligence and will functions quite differently from ours. They would not seem subject to all the limitations and weaknesses of mind that afflict human beings, especially considering the consequences of "original sin."

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Whatever our original fault may have been exactly (the catechism calls it "sin" only in an analogical sense), or precisely how it came about, the natural limits that our human nature places on us are worsened by the fact that this nature is somehow wounded. We are inclined to stumble, fall, misjudge and see so many circumstances only partially and darkly. All of us have plenty of personal experience of this sightlessness and frailty.

As the catechism notes, quoting Vatican Council II, our weak situation extends even "to the negative influence exerted on people by communal situations and social structures that are the fruit of men's sins." (No. 407; Church in the Modern World, 37)

Apparently none of this infirmity and partial blindness would apply to angels. Because of their nature, their intellects not being clouded as ours are, their knowledge would be more immediate and encompassing, their decisions more definitive. They would, so to speak, become aware of nothing "tomorrow" that they didn't know today.

In other words, there would be no surprises in the consequences of their rejection of intimate friendship with God, no new insights or wonder to bring them to repentance. It's a most interesting subject that arouses our curiosity, but I believe this is about as far as we can go in speculating about the fall of the angels.

The catechism discusses the angels' sin briefly in Nos. 391-395.

Lent: Finding your way into daily prayer

Prayer must be first thing scheduled, not last

When I was a young college student, I sometimes felt lonely. I would go to the beautiful old church on our campus and look at the huge white columns that reflected light from the stained-glass windows.

I would find myself wistfully day-dreaming. If only, I thought, Christ himself could step out of the shadows and come down and sit by me in this pew. I could tell him all my problems and confusion. He would understand. He would provide wise counsel, clear direction.

The memory of those moments of longing is strong. As I've grown older, I realize that what I was experiencing was a deep desire for prayer.

Although it took years, I was fortunate to develop a daily habit of prayer that continues to grow stronger. I know prayer has changed my life.

Recently I had the opportunity to interview a young Jesuit for an article in my local Catholic newspaper. He clearly illustrated the difference daily prayer can make in a person's life.

He was a West Point graduate, a bright guy with every intention of making the military his life's career. But, after a few years in the Army, something didn't feel quite right. A friend suggested he make a weekend retreat. And so he did.

Now, the retreat did not provide any bolt-of-lightning answers, no "Ah-ha!" moments of revelation. But within months he left the military, and not too long after that he was on the road to priesthood.

What called forth such a radical change in this man's journey?

"My prayer life began again as a result of the retreat," he told me. "I realized my deep desires had been covered up by my successes."

A daily prayer life allowed him to see the true desires God had placed in his heart.

Opening up to a life of prayer is, on the one hand, simple. If you wish to "give up" something for Lent, give up 10 or 15 minutes each day, as a beginning, to listen to God.

On the other hand, that can sound quite difficult. How does a busy young mother with babies and an erratic schedule find the right time for prayer? How do we fit silence into our noisy days? And how do we pray? How do we know whether we are listening to God or to our own chatter instead?

For me, the first and largest hurdle was finding the right time and sticking to it. Simply hoping I would fit prayer in never worked. Prayer must be the first thing scheduled, not the last.

For me, and for many, early morning is the best time for prayer.

My soldier-turned-Jesuit friend put it well: "Morning prayer set straight my whole day."

The "how-to" of prayer can be helped along by Scripture. I had a spiritual director once who told me to pray with the day's Scripture — the daily Mass readings. Pick one, read it slowly; prayerfully ask God to show you what it might be saying to you.

A wonderful way to find help with this is at www.sacredspace.ie, a prayer site run by the Irish Jesuits. This site will guide you in a 10-minute meditation using each day's Scripture.

Creighton University's wonderful Online Ministries has a site devoted to Lenten prayer this year. Pray with them at www.creighton.edu/CollaborativeMinistry/Lent.

Perhaps the best advice was offered by another spiritual director, a no-nonsense religious sister who displayed this sign in her office: "Just do it!"

I'm sure she'd agree that Lent is a good time to begin.

Marching for life

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

PACE IS SLOW, STEADY, BUT UNRELENTING

Washington, D.C., witnessed the March for Life Jan. 24. Though it was accompanied by cold weather, thousands of marchers from around the United States descended upon the city.

The French word for "march" connotes pacing off a boundary. It also means to walk with regular steps of equal length, denoting steady advance and progress. In music, a march has a steady, even beat.

Marchers for life represent defenders of the boundaries that God advocates for preserving life. When those boundaries are overstepped, everything is "out of step"; the harmony and order necessary for excellence in life are jeopardized.

Racism is one of life's enemies. Racism violates the boundaries that safeguard human dignity and wrongs life's nobility. To deny the unborn the right to live is to assault the selfless love of God.

When euthanasia is touted as a way to end suffering, the very Christian principles that help us to understand and cope with suffering are undermined. When capital punishment is accepted as a means of curtailing violent crimes, life's endless capacity for redemption and forgiveness is ignored.

Marching for life is one of the most powerful instruments we have for keeping sight of life's sacred reality and for reminding us that when we violate God's boundaries, we violate the essence of life.

The March for Life is a slow, steady movement up Capitol Hill to the U.S. Supreme Court. The pace of the march is a reminder that winning the battle for the sanctity of life requires steadfastness.

Ironically, the Supreme Court, where the March for Life ends, lauds a symbol of perseverance in a frieze chiseled above its pillars. In it are a rabbit and a turtle; they recall Aesop's fable in which a slow, steady turtle doesn't lose spirit in a race against a quick-footed rabbit. As we know, the turtle does win, teaching us that we should never let anything break our spirit.

A march also has a unique ability to solidify people. As people march along together, their esprit d'corps soars. They are bound together as a team.

Marching for life requires that marchers put aside individualism and become a team. It is the kind of team they are that makes such a difference. This is God's team protecting God's boundaries. The role of marchers for life is to keep people from abandoning Christian values and to invite them to join the culture of life.

Your impossible dreams

Youths need to believe in themselves

"They're" coming. Are you ready? It may sound, on the surface, like a line from a bad movie about zombies. In reality, it is one of the most important questions to consider if you have big ideas and impossible dreams.

"They" are the faceless, judgmental aggregate, a gathered mass of experts you can't identify by name, affiliation or location. But you hear them within yourself and allow them to influence your most important views and decisions. "They" will tell you that you are wrong, though "they" are very rarely right themselves.

You already know their work, found in such statements as "They will think I can't sing, so I won't audition for the school musical."

The most wonderful ideas always masquerade as impossible dreams.

Personal experience has taught me that the ability to deal effectively with these unseen "authorities" can mark the difference between crossing the finish line and never even leaving the starting gate.

I try not to listen to "them" because they rarely condone or support good ideas. Popularity and common opinion can make them seem wise and all-knowing, but the truth is that they have made a shocking number of off-base predictions throughout the years.

When I was 14, "they" said that alternative rock, like Nirvana, was just a phase. Tell that, 10 years later, to the teen-agers who still listen to bands like Green Day, Evanescence and the Yeah Yeah Yeahs.

"They" told two guys named Orville and Wilbur that human flight was impossible, but in 1903 the Wright brothers defied the odds at Kitty Hawk, N.C., with the first controlled airplane.

"They" told Helen Keller's parents that their daughter always would be useless, stuck in a world of silence and darkness due to her twin disabilities. Once a teacher named Anne Sullivan taught Helen to read and write, Helen went on to become one of America's most inspirational success stories.

These days, "they" are still getting it wrong.

Four years ago, "they" told Apple Inc. that nobody wanted to buy songs off of the Internet. Once folks got used to Napster and illegal downloading, "they" said nobody was going to be so silly as to pay for a song they could get by Googling it.

"They" must be singing a different tune now. Apple has quietly announced that four years after its original release date, the company's iTunes music store is handling more than 1 million downloads a day.

Coming of Age

KAREN
CNS COLUMNIST

That's more than $990,000 every 24 hours. Not too bad for an idea that "they" originally rejected as being stupid.

"They" said polio was incurable. Two men named Salk and Sabin found a vaccine, and Americans are now basically immune to polio from their first year of life.

"They" said people never could walk on the moon. Today, walking on the moon is something we learn about in the history books.

More often than not, I've found that what seems to be distant and impossible actually is achievable if I work hard enough and believe in what I am doing. Could I have imagined, 10 years ago, that I would graduate from college? Be a reporter? Have my own place? I would have thought it was impossible at 14. I've now attained all of that, and have more dreams waiting in the wings.

If "they" are telling you that your dreams are impossible, don't listen. Instead, prove them wrong. Believe in yourself and put the pedal to the metal.

This is the way to go. Your iPod could tell you that!

Pope distributes ashes to doctors in hospital room Mass

Catholics gather for Ash Wednesday, offer prayers for pope

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Pope John Paul II invited all of his doctors to an Ash Wednesday Mass in his hospital room and personally distributed ashes to them, the Vatican newspaper said.

The newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, said the Feb. 9 liturgy underscored the "spiritual vigor" of the 84-year-old pontiff, who was spending his ninth day in the hospital for flu-related respiratory problems.

Placing ashes on the foreheads of the small group in his room, the pope pronounced the Lenten reminder: "You are dust and to dust you shall return." The pope received ashes from one of the concelebrants.

Cardinal Camillo Ruini, papal vicar of Rome, visited the pope later in the day and told reporters, "I found him doing really well." He said the two had discussed the beginning of Lent in the Diocese of Rome.

The cardinal encouraged people to have "full trust" in the pope's recovery.

The Vatican said Feb. 7 the 84-year-old pontiff was improving steadily, but did not say when he could leave the hospital. The next medical bulletin was expected Feb. 10.

As Catholics, including top Vatican cardinals, gathered in St. Peter's Basilica to receive ashes at the beginning of Lent, they offered special prayers for Pope John Paul II.

U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary, presided over the Feb. 9 Ash Wednesday prayer service for Pope John Paul. The cardinal told the congregation he had "the joy and honor of presiding over this solemn liturgy in the name of the Holy Father."

U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford receives ashes from Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, during an Ash Wednesday service in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican Feb. 9.

"We feel his spiritual presence among us and we remember him with affection, asking the Lord to grant him the necessary graces for his primal charism of confirming the brothers and sisters in the unity of the faith," Cardinal Stafford said.

In his homily, Cardinal Stafford said the conversion to which all people are called — especially during Lent — involves three things: "almsgiving, which is sharing; prayer, which is entrusting yourself to the Lord; and fasting, which is knowing how to place limits on yourself."

The cardinal said that obviously even the cardinals, bishops and priests who work at the Vatican "experience each day our limits and our fragility."

But almsgiving, prayer and fasting prepare the heart to receive God's grace and help each believer become a true witness of his peace in the world, the cardinal said.

Lenten guidelines

A general introduction to the season

Lent is the season the Catholic Church gives us to review our lives, to root out all that is not good and true and replace it with the faithful and the holy. In these 40 days, the Catholic Church turns to the ancient penitential practices of fasting, almsgiving and prayer. These practices remain as rich and life-giving in the year 2005 as they were when practiced by the early Christians and by our Jewish forbearers.

Fasting reminds us of our hunger for God, which no worldly thing can satisfy. Almsgiving reminds us that love of God and love of neighbor are inextricably intertwined, and that we bear responsibility for each other. Prayer reminds us to center our lives on God who alone gives meaning to all we do.

The liturgies and devotions of Lent call us to a kind of spiritual "spring cleaning," identifying relationships that are disordered and sins that imprison and then seeking forgiveness and healing. We root out the darkness of sin so as to enter the Easter mysteries with a clean heart bathed in the healing, life-giving light of Christ.

Guidelines for Lent

1) The time of Lent is to be observed by Catholics as a special season of prayer, penance and works of charity.

2) Ash Wednesday, Feb. 9, and Good Friday, March 25, in particular, are the most important penitential days of the liturgical year. They are days of both fast and abstinence. All Fridays in Lent are days of abstinence.

3) The rule of fasting states that only one full meal a day can be taken. Two small meals, "sufficient to maintain strength," are allowed, but together they should not equal another full meal. Eating between meals breaks the fast, but drinking liquids does not. The rule of fasting binds all Catholics from age 18 to 59.

4) Abstinence refers to the eating of meat. Under the present law, it does not include egg or milk products, meat stock soups or gravies. The rule of abstinence binds all Catholics 14 years old and older.

5) The substantial observance of the laws of fast and abstinence is a serious obligation. Those whose work or health would be impaired are excused from fasting and abstaining. The individual conscience can decide if there is a proper cause to excuse. A more serious reason should be present to excuse from Ash Wednesday and Good Friday penance.

6) Self-imposed fasting on the other weekdays of Lent is recommended. Abstinence on all Fridays of the year is also highly recommended. The Peace Pastoral of the American Bishops, stating that prayer is incomplete without penance, urges Friday abstinences as something all-American Catholics should offer up for the sake of world peace.

7) Children who are not bound by the laws of fasting and abstinence should be raised in an atmosphere that is conducive to a sense of penance.

8) The faithful should be clearly and positively encouraged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation during Lent. There should be adequate time scheduled for confessions before Easter. Group reconciliation services should not be scheduled for the last days of the Holy Week. At no time is it permitted to schedule a group reconciliation service for the purpose of giving general absolution without individual confessions.

9) The liturgical directions of the Sacramentary and the Lectionary must be faithfully observed regarding all the special Holy Week rites.

10) Funeral Masses are not allowed on Holy Thursday, Good Friday or Holy Saturday. The funeral rite outside of Mass can be held either in church or at the chapel on those days, with a funeral Mass later.

11) The RCIA is incorporated into the liturgy during Lent. The Rite of Election is celebrated on the first Sunday of Lent. On the third, fourth and fifth Sundays of Lent, the Scrutinies take place during Mass.

HAVE SNOWMOBILE, WILL TRAVEL

For the last 17 years, Father Charles Brooks, pastor of St. Edward Church in Mackville, Wis., has been riding in the annual MS Snowmobile Classic Tour, in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. He and eight other members of St. Edward's took to the road Feb. 4 for Watersmeet, Mich., and two days of snowmobiling 100 to 150 miles a day to raise pledges to find a cure for multiple sclerosis.

Priest snowmobiles to benefit multiple sclerosis fund

GREEN BAY, Wis. (CNS) — For most people, snowmobiling is a sport that costs money — with some new sleds selling for more than $10,000. For an eastern Wisconsin priest, however, snowmobiling is a way to make money.

For the past 17 years, Father Charles Brooks, pastor of St. Edward Church in Mackville, has been riding in the annual MS Snowmobile Classic Tour in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. He and eight other members of St. Edward's went off Feb. 4 to Watersmeet, Mich., for two days of snowmobiling 100 to 150 miles a day to raise money for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society.

In the past 17 years, Father Brooks alone has raised $167,000. This year more than 128 snowmobilers participated in the tour, raising some $225,000.

"First of all, I had a sister, Theresa Kemkes, who had MS for 44 years," said Father Brooks. "She was in a wheelchair for 42 of those years."

This isn't the only event for which Father Brooks has ridden his sled. In the 1980s and 1990s, he was well known locally for his 24-hour Enduros for Life to raise funds for pro-life causes. In 1987 he set a world record of 1,409 miles in 24 hours on one sled. That didn't count the miles he put in on a back-up sled while his primary snowmobile was being hastily repaired.

The priest, 67, has also ridden motorcycles and jet skis for his Enduros fund-raiser, but his main love is the snowmobile.

"I'm one of the pioneers in snowmobiling, at least locally," he said. "I got my first snowmobile in 1968, when I was (associate pastor) at St. Gabriel's in Neenah. I kept it out behind the garage."

Over the years, he has had his share of spills and cold weather — he said he has been out in temperatures as low as 41 degrees below zero — but he has never broken any bones. He did suffer a compound dislocation of a finger, but claims to have "a skeleton of steel."

Father Brooks said he can no longer handle 24 hours straight on a snowmobile.

"Unless you do 500 miles regularly, you get pretty stiff in the shoulder muscles," he said.

But he plans to continue his snowy rides. After all, he points out, the regulars in the MS tour range in age from their teens to their 70s.

"I'm one of the oldest," he admitted, "but not the oldest!"

Commemorative book about diocese to be published; writers sought

CHARLOTTE — To observe its 35th anniversary, the Diocese of Charlotte will create a commemorative book of diocesan history, spiritual reflections and photographs.

The book, which does not yet have a title, will be available in the fall 2006. Editions du Signe of Strasbourg, France will publish the book.

To be designed as a "coffee table" book, the commemorative edition will feature a history of the diocese and color photographs of the people and parishes that have shaped Catholic life in western North Carolina since the diocese's founding in 1972. Catholics in the diocese will be invited to submit stories or spiritual reflections for publication.

"We hope to create an attractive large-format book that is filled with stories and pictures depicting the history and faith of the Catholic people of western North Carolina, and to increase spiritual awareness among Catholics and non-Catholics," said

David Hains, director of communications and project manager for the book.

According to Hains, the book will focus on stories and reflections on the following topics: inspiring stories of faith that are woven with a description of a church/faith community; the blessings of multicultural worship; those who brought Catholicism when they relocated to western North Carolina; those who grew up Catholic in western North Carolina, when there were few Catholics in the region; those who converted to Catholicism; love for the Eucharist; what the Catholic faith teaches others, especially non-Catholics.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says without public faith or values fanaticism tends to grow

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When faith and faith-based values are banned from the public arena, fanaticism tends to grow and can endanger public order, Pope John Paul II said.

On the other hand, “a legitimate and healthy” separation of church and state guarantees everyone the right to profess his or her faith and to try to defend faith-based values in laws and in social life, he said.

In a message released by the Vatican Feb. 12, Pope John Paul wrote to the bishops of France to mark the 100th anniversary of the passage of France’s “Law of Separation” of church and state.

Despite initial periods of serious tension and turmoil — including the confiscation of church property and banning religious from teaching in schools — the French government and the Catholic Church in France have developed a relationship of respect and cooperation for the good of the nation, the pope said.

Material well-being and technological advances cannot answer people’s questions about why they were created and what the purpose of their lives is, he said.

By giving witness to their faith in God and to the existence of objective moral truths, French Catholics can help others discover the meaning of true freedom, which involves acting in accordance with the laws of God and the requirements of the common good, the pope said.

Allowing believers to express their faith and their values in public, he said, lends “dynamism” to public discussions about building a better society and alleviates “the tendency to seek refuge in sectarianism, which can represent a danger for the state itself.”

Vatican: Rice says Holy Land, religious freedom on U.S. agenda

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice assured top Vatican officials that the Holy See’s concerns over the Holy Land and religious freedom in the Middle East and China would be on the U.S. agenda.

Rice, on her first visit to the Vatican as newly appointed secretary of state, was to have met with Pope John Paul II, but his hospitalization kept him away. She made the visit as part of her seven-day tour of Europe and Israel.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, and the Vatican’s foreign minister, Archbishop Giovanni Lajolo, and other Vatican officials welcomed Rice and her entourage Feb. 8 in the Vatican for “an exchange of opinions,” Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said.

Rice, who had just come from a two-day visit to Israel and the West Bank, told Vatican officials that she had some good news concerning the Holy Land.

She said that for the first time, Israeli and Palestinian leaders were saying the same things and that the two sides wanted to make the most of the new opportunities opened to them.

Rice’s Feb. 8 comments came just hours before Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas formally announced a cease-fire aimed at ending four years of violence.

Rice assured Cardinal Sodano that she would be personally engaged in following the Middle East peace process.

Cardinal Sodano and Archbishop Lajolo outlined the Vatican’s concerns in the Holy Land, especially concerning finding a resolution to territorial issues, the status of Palestinian refugees and the final status of Jerusalem. The archbishop specified that the Vatican wished that the sacred character of Jerusalem be recognized and that priests and other religious have access to the city without hindrance or difficulty.

Rice said the United States agreed with those principles, but she cautioned there was much work to be done before discussions on Jerusalem’s final status could be approached.

Time spent on talks about Iraq was brief: Rice emphasized she was aware of the difficulties Iraqi Christians were facing. Many Christian churches have been the target of bombings and attacks by insurgents.

Rice promised that the United States was working to encourage the eventual formation of a government that protected religious minorities in Iraq.

Cardinal Sodano told Rice he appreciated President Bush’s strong spiritual and moral approach to his leadership; Rice said she appreciated the Holy See’s longstanding efforts promoting interreligious dialogue and the fight against HIV/AIDS.

Polling at the post office

CHARLOTTE — Members of Boy Scout Troop 174 from St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte spent their Saturday morning at Charlotte-area post offices educating customers about the U.S. Constitution Feb 12.

In honor of the upcoming Liberty Day, observed each year on March 16, the Boy Scouts asked willing customers one of 34 questions about the Constitution. In two hours, three Scouts at the Park Road Shopping Center Post Office surveyed about 75 people about their knowledge of the document that forms the basis of the U.S. governing system.

The project grew out of a recent presentation by members of the Lions Club to Troop 174. Following the Lions Club visit, the Scouts decided to go out into their communities and find out just how much Americans know about their governing doctrine. They received permission from the post offices to poll patrons.

"It's important for people to know about the Constitution," said Raul Farroch, second vice president of the SouthPark Lions Club.

The Scouts found that only about one in four people answered their questions correctly. Everyone surveyed received a booklet containing the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution and its 27 amendments.

The post office customers weren't the only ones getting an education. Nick Hagopian, a seventh-grader and member of Troop 174, learned there are 27 amendments.

Fellow Scout and seventh-grader T.J. Roux learned the first seven words of the Constitution: "We the people of the United States."

pathy for the poor and hungry of the world Feb. 11-12.

The agenda for the fast was based on Food Fast, a program designed by Catholic Relief Services (CRS). This was the second year the youth group elected to participate in the hunger-awareness fast.

During their 24 hours of fasting, the youths studied poverty on global and personal levels. During a visit to a local Habitat for Humanity site, the teen-agers learned about conditions in West Africa from the project foreman, who had built homes for Habitat for Humanity in that impoverished part of the world.

"In West Africa, many people only eat one meal every other day," said June Bullock, one of the co-advisors for the youth group.

Another activity consisted of youths working out hypothetical budgets as if they earned minimum wage. Later in the day, they took their budgets to a grocery store to learn how much food could be purchased based on their budgets.

The youths quickly realized how much has to be sacrificed by a person earning $5.15 an hour. Slashed from the budget were entertainment, new clothes, even health insurance.

"It's next to impossible to live on $752 a month," said sophomore Steven Zabel.

Every few hours, the fasters were allowed to drink a cup of juice. Other than that, they went completely without food.

"I learned what it's like to be hungry, even for one day," said freshman Cody Gonzalez. "It's not pleasant."

The teen-agers were allowed to drink as much water as they wanted — some of the time. In order to drink water, they first had to draw a card from a basket. Some of the cards allowed "safe passage" to drink from the fountain. Other cards "afflicted"

Hunger is a global problem

Every day, 799 million people in developing countries go hungry.

Every year, 6 million children under the age of five die as a result of hunger.

Approximately 2.8 billion people live on less than $2 a day.

More than 1.2 billion of these — one in five — survive on less than $1 a day.

Approximately 1.1 billion people lack access to clean water and 2.4 billion live without adequate sanitation, mostly in Asia and Africa.

Every 14 seconds, someone dies from a disease caused by contaminated water, inadequate sanitation or poor hygiene. Seventy percent of water-related diseases could be avoided.

them with a waterborne disease and required a five-minute wait. The final cards struck the faster with a land mine, causing them to ask a friend to pull a card in an attempt to get a drink for them.

The parish supports the youth group's fast with financial donations. Last year's fast raised $960, which was then donated to CRS.

During their fast, the teen-agers and their advisors held a candlelight vigil for the victims of the Dec. 26 tsunami victims.

"Letting go of my normal routine made me think more about the people who live without clean water, food and shelter," said senior Jennifer Geyer.

"'Last Kiss' by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. 'Last Kiss' is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

Moving on to self-sufficiency

DSA helps Mother's Home shelter pregnant homeless women

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

HICKORY — Expectant mothers in desperate need of housing are getting additional help, thanks to the Diocesan Support Appeal.

"The diocesan housing corporation is giving $5,000 in February to Mother's Home, a component of the Family Care Center of Catawba Valley, to support their efforts to house homeless pregnant women," said Gerry Carter, director of the Catholic Diocese of Charlotte Housing Corporation.

The housing corporation, one of the 36 ministries funded by the DSA, became involved with the Family Care Center as part of an ongoing effort to help local initiatives already in existence.

"This money will be coupled with efforts by the Catholic Social Services Respect Life Program to support this ministry," said Carter. "This is an effort to use diocesan money to serve as leaven for a community-based response to housing needs."

The Family Care Center has provided transitional housing for homeless families with dependent children since 1989. In April 2004, the Family Care Center opened Mother's Home, a home specifically for homeless pregnant women.

"(Mother's Home) is pro-life and highly ecumenical," said Carter. "Its purpose is to do case management and help the women to get off the street while they are pregnant and move into self-sufficiency."

The home is open to women of all races and religions, who come from throughout North Carolina.

Residents of Mother's Home must be pregnant with their first child in order to live in the facility and may stay there until six weeks after giving birth. The house provides shelter for four women at a time.

"Mother's Home gives these women a chance to get their feet back on the ground," said Sandra Cale, a social worker and staff member of the Family Care Center.

Some of the women are homeless because they have fled abusive relationships.

According to Cale, residents are provided shelter, clothing, transportation and help in finding permanent housing. In addition, they are required to attend behavior modification, prenatal and postpartum care and parenting classes.

Residents also must hold jobs or attend school, or both, while at Mother's House, said Cale.

"We're battling 700 on our former residents," said Cale. "Most of them are working or going to college, and living in their own apartments."

Although residents are given the option of putting their babies up for adoption, so far all of the women have chosen to raise their children.

"For many of these women, this is the first love they've ever had in their lives," said Cale. "Their children are all theirs, and they give them all the love they need."

Gloria in excelsis Deo

Understanding the Mystery of the Mass, Part 8

We mentioned last week that the Mass is the greatest prayer of the Catholic Church. As the highest act of prayer, the Mass teaches us how to pray. The first movement of the heart in prayer is humility and so we enter into the Mass by first calling to mind our sins and seeking the divine mercy of God in the Penitential Rite. Only then, only after recognizing our need for forgiveness and only after acknowledging the abundant mercy that God supplies us in our need, are we able to sing for joy in the ancient hymn of the Gloria.

And so, the Mass teaches us that prayer begins with humility and moves to praise and adoration of God: after the Penitential Rite follows the Gloria.

Upon close inspection, we discover there is not a single word in the Gloria that is not also found in the letters of St. Paul or in the writings of St. John. The Gloria is one of the oldest Christian hymns. The earliest records of the ancient Christians, dating as far back as the early second century, refer to singing the angelic hymn, known as the Gloria in excelsis Deo ["Glory to God in the highest"] before the sacrifice of the Mass.

From the very beginning, singing the Gloria was particularly appropriate during the Christmas season, since the angels sang the opening words of the hymn after the birth of our Lord. Later evidence shows that the Gloria was given wider range to be sung at Sunday Masses throughout the year, but only when the bishop offered the sacrifice. It wasn't until almost the 12th century that the Gloria was extended to every Sunday Mass offered by priests, as well as bishops.

The Gloria is composed of three main parts and refers to the three divine persons of the Blessed Trinity. The first section praises the Father, beginning with the words of the angels to the shepherds after the birth of our Lord: "Glory to God in the highest and peace to his people on earth." The hymn continues to praise the Father: "Lord God, heavenly King, almighty God and Father; we worship you, we give you thanks, we praise you for your glory."

In other parts of the Mass, we thank and praise God for what he has accomplished. But here, in the Gloria, we thank God for who he is, not for what he does.

The second section of the Gloria is addressed to the eternal Son of God: "Lord, Jesus Christ, only son of the Father, Lord God, Lamb of God, you take away the sins of the world: have mercy on us; you are seated at the right hand of the Father: receive our prayer." Again, we praise the Son of God firstly for who he is, then for what he has accomplished.

Only after recognizing the divine identity of the Son can we petition him to "receive our prayer."

The hymn surges to its height and then its completion as we move to the third section that includes reference to the Holy Spirit: "For you alone are the Holy One, you alone are the Lord, you alone are the Most High, Jesus Christ, with the Holy Spirit, in the glory of God the Father. Amen."

This completes our hymn of praise to the Blessed Trinity. It is important to note that we do not sing the Gloria during the two penitential seasons of the Church year — Advent and Lent — as a communal preparation for Christmas and Easter.

Following the Gloria, the Introductory Rites of the Mass reach their summit in the Opening Prayer or collect. After we have approached God in humility to seek his mercy and praised him for his glory, we now approach him in petition or supplication. The priest, speaking on behalf of the church, collects the intentions of the day's sacrifice.

He begins, "Let us pray," inviting the church to join him in petitioning the Lord. There is a brief moment of silence to allow us the opportunity to collect our petitions and intentions. The celebrant extends his hands in prayer, known as the orans position, a typical prayer posture for those who are begging for a gift, as well as the posture of one who beholds God in his glory.

The faithful participate in this prayer by responding "Amen," which means "so be it."

It is an assent to all that has been accomplished in the Introductory Rites of the Mass: from humility, to praise and, finally, to petition.

Next week we will begin to examine the Liturgy of the Word.

Father Buettner is parochial vicar of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.
